instruction may be given her. The education given by the State necessarily stops short when the scholar can by no possibility be considered fully educated. She has no finishing schools to look forward to, but at the age of fourteen is turned out, with a smattering of knowledge on a great many things, to earn a living which she could do far better if she were completely mistress of some one method of doing it. If women were more closely connected with the management of board schools it is probable that the education there would be more domestic. As it is, there does seem some room for improvement. As the care of the home lies in the woman's hands and is frequently her life work, either in marriage or in domestic service, it is obvious that it comes under the head of technical training for her. A little knowledge is a dangerous thing, and ignorance is not always the exact contradiction of wisdom. A head full of dates is not necessarily a wise one, and when so many women are appointed by duty to be Marthas it seems as if they ought to be taught to do many things well so that they may not be careful and troubled about them. If Mary had had no sister she would have had to look after the welfare of her guest, and if she had not known how to do it she would probably have been much too flustered to give her whole attention to the better part.

SOME NEW NOVELS.

It is perhaps the peculiar failing of the woman writer to talk shop. In Mrs. Mary Mann's "Astray in Arcady" (Methuen, 6s.) Charlotte Poole is an authoress, a genius, an evocator of thousands a year. While she is making spiteful, non-humorous remarks about parsons, peasants, and parvenus in East Anglia, her books run into sixth editions, and have "just arrived from the publisher" when an enemy calls. She endeavours to promote a love affair, introduces conventional political saws into the mouth of the village politician, and—but I fancy that East Anglia must have been much relieved when she reassumed her rôle of genius and deprived them of her society by returning to London. In "Astray in Arcady" Mrs. Mann is, I fear, trading upon a certain reputation; bitterness without humour appeals to few; Mrs. Mann is not only astray in Arcady; she has run amok in it.

"The Lovely Mrs. Blake" (Cassell, 6s.) disappears; Mr. Blake disappears; the baby disappears. At the risk of appearing tedious, I would also note that the corpse of a drowned man disappears. Mrs. Blake has had a history—quite a reputable history, but it rouses her husband's worst passions. The "history" is deposed by an unintelligent third party to have turned up. There is blood upon the cradle, blood upon the floor. The unintelligent party is a modern young man, with a knack of falling in love, quite platonically, of course, with married women. He it is, however, who unties the granny knot of Mr. Richard Marsh's plot, and proves the "history" to have been quite some one else. Re-enter Mr. Blake, Mrs. Blake, and Master Blake to live happily ever afterwards. Q.E.F.

There is no denying that the most sophisticated of us love sentiment and adore heroics. In "The Silent Call" (Harpers, 6s.) Mr. Edwin Milton Royle supplies a sequel to the "White Man" of Waller fame. And a very good sequel it is. Calthorpe is the son of the Earl and the Indian woman who in the play commits a rather convenient suicide. He has all the breeziness of his father, and as much quixotism. The call of the blood takes him away from his wife to cowboyism. Stirring events would have combined to make him a hero had he not also fallen in love with Wah-na-gi. Of course, he puts honour before love; of course, his wife dies at the critical moment; and, of course, he triumphs over the Trust. But in spite of the artificiality of his mechanism, Mr. Royle has written a book that lives and moves and has its being.

Your American novelist is nothing if not psychological; with all the precocity of youth he handles the simple old love themes with the complexity of modern phraseology. "The Wild Olive" (Methuen, 6s.) has for this reason a freshness and directness which it could only have attained in America. Ford has been accused unjustly of murder and sentenced. Escaping, he works his way to a good position and proposes to a young friend of the girl who helped him to freedom. The story of his determination to have her willy nilly, and of his subsequent yielding to counsels of perfection to stand his trial like a man, is related with a pleasing sincerity, if perhaps at too great length. The anonymous author has written a book that is really worth reading, but with regard to the subtlety and emotional capacity of the American methinks he doth protest too much as to its existence.

It has yet to be realised by the world at large that not every one who has learned to write legibly can necessarily write a great novel. Mrs. Comyns Carr's "By Ways That They Knew Not" (Chapman and Hall, 6s.) is a poignant example of the novel that has nothing in common with life. The heroine's eyes are novelistic; the child talks as might a book, and not a very good book at that; the grave strong man falls in love with the gentle, clinging girl, only to find that he has a wife. The gentle, clinging girl bids him repair to his wife; the grave strong man at length conquers his feelings sufficiently to do so; the wife dies suddenly just before he gets there, and a wedding in the near future is inevitable. This is one of the novels that have been wholly written before.

A gorilla is the hero of "Bellcroft Priory" ("The Bodley Head," 6s.). There are murders and plottings, and quite a number of people meet not only with death, but with a horrible death. Mr. Bourne Cook seems a little uncertain of his period. While acknowledging the year 1795 by a casual reference to stealing as a capital offence, there is little other indication of the date. On the contrary, the gorilla, first "invented" by Du Chaillu, certainly was never heard of in 1795, nor from all accounts has he ever been tamed. The feat of taming may be permitted Mr. Cook, but not the anachronism which dislocates the whole story.

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Thursday.—I am still the guest of Virginia, with Nita as commander-in-chief. My hostesses have developed a taste for the popular sport of cottage hunting. Daily we search the country round for an old homestead which shall be thatched and detached, situated on the edge of some golf links, and at once quite secluded and very near a station. The desirable residence existent in the brain of Virginia reposes in the heart of the woods, directly adjacent to a thriving town. It possesses a croquet lawn and a tennis lawn surrounded by an orchard and a few incidental virtues, such as kennels for a tribe of dogs she does not possess, runs for numberless chickens that have not hatched, stables for ponies she has not matched, and a rent perennially free until a next quarter day. As an occupation to last a lifetime I am ready to recommend our quest, which would tax the optimism even of a house agent—a genus represented mainly here by a little boy who can scarcely climb down from his stool, and obviously doubles the part with that of village idiot.

However, we have had some gorgeous drives, and Virginia and Nita, determined to do the thing properly, have bought each other some new knitted coats eminently fitted to grace their tours. Nita's is of dark cornflower blue silk, an excellent specimen of its kind, reaching almost to her ankles, and with it she wears a small round bright blue beaver hat encircled with a little wreath of silken flowers in blue with green leaves. Virginia, as more becoming to her years, has chosen a knitted coat of grey silk with a cap to match enwrapped with grey chiffon. They both look very nice, and I am ordered to send suitable skirts and blouses directly I return to London. Ready-made blue and grey tweed will be entirely appropriate, and the achievement of ninon blouses to match should, of course, be the occupation of the autumnal days of Virginia's maid, who cannot have anything more worthy to do if her mistress proceed on her present rural ways, when dress, as she is elegantly spoke, must be outside the limits of her desires.

Yet after our day's work was done and we were sitting round a fine modern specimen of a coal fire I was ordered to talk about frocks and fashions.

"Incongruous," I protested. "I have not an idea in my head beyond velvet tea-gowns and the empire of charmeuse." Then I consented to describe my last acquisition made in cachemire de soie in smoke grey, with a collar bandless neck, decked with skunk, black satin, and buttons. Afterwards we fell to gossiping on the peculiarities of our dearest enemies—an inexhaustibly fascinating topic—and at eleven I crawled up to my bed, which might have been softer, and grumbled at the insufficient light afforded by four unwholesome-looking candles generously supplied by my entertainers. My last words were, "Do not forget to add electric light to your other requirements in that unique old-world homestead."

Friday.—I have it on the authority of the calendar that it is not spring; and yet I awoke to the wildest chattering of the birds. Perchance they were discussing the autumn millinery and the possible slaughter of their distant relations. I wandered down the dahlia-lined garden path, and repenting of my last night's reticence whilst waiting for my morning papers amiably offered myself as the fount of all information on the vital subjects of frocks and hats. My monologue ran thus:—

The autumn costumes are braided except those which are made of plain velvet, and a few of these show braid bindings. Faced cloth, fine diagonal serge, ratine, and camel's hair are material points of the material moment. Long coats, long tight sleeves, and square outlines are much sought after. Linings are usually dark, while Persian and Indian colourings exhibit themselves with considerable persistence on silk and chiffon. An almost black grey is a new colour, and striped and shaded velveteen is out for consideration.

The scarf is the idol of the day; many specimens in velvet, lined with satin and heavily tasselled, are even now parading Bond Street with simple all-in-one-piece cloth dresses which show a little elaboration of golden and Oriental embroidery upon their bodices. Fur scarves are imminent joys for those who can afford them, and the cheap coney scarf is the refuge of the comparatively destitute.

My newest possession.

The flower-pot velvet hat is a monstrous absurdity. Diana called upon me one day last week to complain of its hideousness and its definite aim at extinguishing all contour of head and face; nevertheless, she was wearing one encircled with speckled feathers tied with royal blue velvet. A very popular colour is blue—a right-down regular royal blue.

Skirts are as narrow as they were, but a very short round train is a noticeable feature of evening and afternoon frocks.

The veiling of magnificent embroideries with chiffon or ninon is still popular, and barbaric-looking trimmings inset with jewels are amongst expenses easily and dishonestly incurred.

"Don't talk like a paragraph headed Notes on Novelties," interrupted Nita, ungratefully adding, "I'm bored with clothes; and here comes your boy. Hurry through the news—I'm sure there is not any—and let us come and cottage-hunt."

Thus was my fashionable enthusiasm damped—also my feet—and the rest of the day I spent knocking at strange houses, soothing wild dogs, measuring gravel tracts for conversion into lawns, adding up bedrooms and arranging position for bathrooms where no supply of water was available, and deploring the fact that so many folks wash their linen out of doors.

Saturday.—Nita came down to breakfast armed with a new list from an untried agent. I could keep up the semblance of amiability no longer, and I took the fast train up to town, and telephoned Robert that it was obviously his duty to introduce me to "The Man from the Sea," no matter what his previous plans had been for spending his evening elsewhere. It was a joy to listen to W. J. Locke's admirable phrases, to recognise the fantastic charm of his method, and the romantic spirit of him always so evident in his books. There was infinite wisdom shown in the selection of the dresses suitable for wear in the little cathedral town where the scene is laid. Nina Boucicault looked and acted to the life the heroine with a sense of duty until she awoke to her other senses, and Beryl Faber's brown coat and skirt at once proclaimed her the really good woman who had a somewhat indifferent tailor.

"Loraine is certainly a flyer at acting," said Robert, and thought himself clever for his dictum, which was endorsed by a very cheery and greatly cheering audience where I noticed that nine-tenths of the women wore round their heads shaped bandages of bugled net held by cabochons, and that the other tenth had dressed their hair with a fork. The latest haystack coiffure is a definite change from the close coils of yesteryear, but I pray some wisdom may moderate its dishevelled transports.

Monday.—"Oh, listen to my tale of no furs," said Joan, as we sat together after lunch to-day. "I don't possess a skin of any other beast fit to put on my back, and I must have a fur shawl scarf this instant minute."

Sympathetically I voted her case as urgent, and insupportable, and definitely to be reckoned amongst the minor tragedies of life.

"And where shall I buy furs?" she asked.

I replied, "I always get my bread from a baker's."

Her limited intelligence grasped my argument, and after absorbing my looking-glass for ten minutes while she adjusted and re-adjusted a new velvet extinguisher hat, which at no angle became her at all, I conveyed her to the International Fur Store, 163, Regent Street, where the entente cordiale in the animal kingdom of the world is an established fact of my delight. Here the skunk lies down with the chinchilla, the ermine unites itself elegantly with the sable, and the cross fox ties itself in double blessedness to form the ideal stole.

When Joan was little she wrote in a confession book "Sable" as her besetting weakness, and under the heading of "What others?" declared for "More sable." O wise young judge! We met some gorgeous specimens of sables. I never saw a finer collection—sumptuous is the only word—and they appeared in every fashionable form, from the smallest tie fastening tightly round the neck, to the coat worth a large section of a small fortune. There was one glorious stole of great width, round at the back with a small turnover collar at the front, and long ends, lined with brown crêpe de chine, which was a notable circumstance. Another treasure was a long, straight scarf of sable liberally supplied with tails; and a sable coat of infinite attraction had the stripes running perpendicularly to the knees and horizontally beyond. The sable muffs were paragons of prodigiousness, either in the large, round, straight shape or in the new pointed flap form with a satin bolster beneath. This same shape had charms also in a combination of chinchilla and skunk, and again in ermine and skunk. In ermine we saw a most delectable double scarf twenty inches broad and reaching to the feet, and a worthy comrade to this was a monster bag muff, tied up with silken tassels.

Upstairs we wandered, even as Alice of history, into Looking-glass Land, for there were no coats lying about, everything was decorous and decorative behind glass doors; and there were glass panels in the pillars, and glasses, glasses everywhere, and we could view ourselves under the influence of the latest edition of luxury, and realise even as the heroine in "The Case of Rebellious Susan," that all women look well in furs.

I noted with joy a novelty in musquash coats; last year's variety bores me considerably. This new style showed stripes of musquash joined diagonally, the points meeting down the back and the lines going across the figure in the front.

"Joan," I said solemnly, "this is your coat, or should be, and you should also endeavour to acquire the wide ermine scarf."

All the new coats are cut in one with the sleeves, a comfortable state of affairs to be commended; and a conspicuous triumph was a raven-blue satin coat suggestive of a monk who had lived in the Empire period. It was held at the waist with a huge cord and tassel, skunk playing its part as a flounce on the hem and forming the collar, while there were lines of braid at the back.

An alluring example of evening cloaks was of oyster-white satin, embroidered in aluminium and gold, lined with pink and edged with sable; and a most worthy garment was a long coat of mole-grey and brown tapestry, lined with mole-grey satin, with a large collar and big pointed Directoire revers made of musquash joined with strips of brown chiffon.

Joan, hesitating between this and the striped musquash, determined that the final choice should depend upon the advance cheque for her new book, which has now reached completion. I counselled her not to let so great a thing as a good winter coat depend upon so small a matter as her literary efforts, and that the necessary means should rest on some such solid basis as a husband's voluntary contribution.

We bore away a copy of the new book of photographed furs and discussed its attractive details at Rumpelmeyer's, where we tea'd and met many pleasant idlers, amongst them William, who had come up to town to "see a friend about a dog." He wanted one to dry the tears of a little girl whose pet had been done to death by a motor-car.

It appears she had posted in the nursery letter-box a short note to the sinning chauffeur:—

Dear Sir,—You are cruel and careless and a murderer, and I can't ever care for any other dog, but you are to please send one immediately, and it must be eight months old and it must win prizes, and it must have a black patch over one eye, and it must be a boy, and I shall never, never love him.

Mrs. A.'s Letter-Box.

Sadfly.—You must have skunk on that black satin, but the flounce might be omitted, and all your capital put into the collar and cuffs.

A SEASONABLE DINNER MENU.

The chief essentials to remember in compiling a "menu" is that soup, fish, flesh, and fowl must form the foundation, and that while providing dainty and tasty dishes, the joint and game courses should be comparatively plain. Further, similarity in the viands must be avoided, nor should it be forgotten that an adequate quantity admirably cooked and served is preferable to useless profusion. These qualities have been studied in the following October dinner-party menu, sufficient for eight persons:—

Tortue Fausse Claire.
Purée de Gibier.

Fillets de Turbot à la Riche.
Blanchailles.

Suprême de Volaille aux Huîtres.

Tournedos de Bœuf à l'Erskine.

Selle d'Agneau.
Céléri Rave.

Canard Sauvage.
Pommes de Terres Frites.
Salade à la Roi.

Pouding Parisien.
Pain d'Ananas à la Crême.

Bouchées à la Karoly.

Tortue Fausse Claire.—Thoroughly cleanse half a calf's head and simmer it for six hours with water, or stock and vegetables to flavour, after which remove the bones and press the head between two dishes. Strain the stock, and, when it is absolutely cold, remove every particle of grease. Pass 2 lbs. of veal through the mincing machine, mix it with two or three eggs and a quart of water, add the stock the head was stewed in, and stir it incessantly until it boils; season the soup with 2 ozs. of lean ham, a bouquet of herbs, a dozen peppercorns, a blade of mace, two cloves, and the usual complement of vegetables to flavour it; remove the flesh from a rabbit, chop the bones, add them to the soup, stir it until it boils, and simmer it two hours, then strain it through a cloth. When heating the soup add a tumbler of sherry, a dust of cayenne, and a teaspoonful of lemon juice. Garnish the soup with pieces of the head and very small quenelles, made with the flesh of the rabbit.

Purée de Gibier.—Old birds answer admirably for purées. A couple of old pheasants or three partridges must be cleansed and stewed with stock and vegetables until the meat is easily detached from the bones, then remove the meat and strain the stock. Pound the meat, adding stock to moisten it. When it has been thoroughly pounded rub it through a tammy or a hair sieve. Thicken the stock with a dessertspoonful of potato fecula, add a glass of claret and mix with the purée of game, add a small piece of glaze, season it with salt and a dust of cayenne pepper. Serve it with dice-shaped pieces of fried bread handed separately.

Fillets de Turbot à la Riche.—Remove the black skin from the fillets of a nice turbot, cut the fillets into neat portions, and arrange them on a buttered sautépan, season them with salt, pepper, a sprinkling of lemon juice, chopped parsley, and a soupçon of shalot. Moisten them with a glass of white wine and a little fish stock. Put greased paper over them and cook them in the oven about thirty minutes. Dish them on a border of mashed potato, which has been brushed with beaten egg and baked a golden colour. Garnish the centre with picked prawns and button mushrooms, put the tail of a prawn on each fillet, and pour the sauce carefully over them. The sauce is made by reducing two tablespoonfuls of vinegar with a chopped shalot in a small stewpan, adding a gill of butter sauce made with the reduced stock of the fish bones, the yolks of two eggs, half a wine-glass of sherry. Stir it on the stove until it thickens, work in an ounce of lobster or prawn butter in small pieces, and, at the last moment, mix in two tablespoonfuls of whipped cream.

Blanchailles.—Drain and pick a pint of whitebait. Have ready two large stewpans half-full of hot lard, two kitchen cloths, and two wire baskets. Throw a large handful of flour on the cloths, on which put about a gill of the fish, shake them lightly in the flour, put them into the baskets, which must be carefully shaken to remove the superfluous flour, plunge the baskets into the hot lard, agitate them gently for three minutes, and drain them on paper. Season them with salt and pepper and serve them at once, with brown bread and butter and cut lemon handed separately.

Suprême de Volaille aux Huîtres.—Make the breast of a large chicken into delicate quenelle, and after rubbing it through a wire sieve work it lightly with ½ pint of double cream in a basin. Decorate a buttered, plain pipe mould with pieces of truffle, fill it with the suprême, twist a paper over it, and steam it half an hour. Blanch twenty-four oysters, convert the strained liquor into sauce, to which add half a gill of cream, salt, pepper, a dust of cayenne, and a teaspoonful of lemon juice; add the bearded oysters after which the sauce must not boil. Garnish the mould with the ragôut of oysters, adding a few slices of truffle, and pour the remainder of the sauce round it.

Tournedos de Bœuf à l'Erskine.—Cut eight round fillets from the under-cut of a sirloin of beef, dip them in salad oil, season them with pepper, and grill them. Arrange each on a croûte of fried bread and dish them in a circle, fill the centre of the dish with potatoes Parisienne, and on each fillet put a piece of butter made in this way:—Dissolve 1 oz. of glaze in the earthenware lining of a double saucepan, stir in 2 ozs. of butter in small pieces, thoroughly mixing one piece before another is added, adding also the strained juice of half a lemon, a teaspoonful of chopped parsley, half a chopped shalot, a sprig of chopped tarragon. Work the butter constantly with a wooden spoon until cold. The Potatoes Parisienne: Cut them with a ball-shaped cutter, partly boil them in salted water, then finish cooking them with butter, pepper, and salt in a sautépan in the oven.

Céléri Rave.—Cut four medium-sized celeriac in halves and trim them into neat half-rounds. Parboil them in salted water for fifteen minutes and drain quite dry; finish cooking them in good stock, which reduce to glaze, adding a pinch of sugar, a spoonful of brown sauce, and a squeeze of lemon juice. Serve the celeride on round croûtons.

Canard Sauvage.—Two fine fat wild duck, roasted briskly for exactly twenty minutes, basted frequently, and served with port wine sauce made in this way:—Cut two strips of thinly pared rind of an orange into fine strips, put it into a stewpan with a glass of port, a dessertspoonful of red currant jelly, and the strained juice of the orange. Allow it to heat gradually, and serve it in a boat.

Salade à la Roi.—Blanch a large handful of parsley with a sprig or two each of tarragon, chives, and chervil. Immerse them in cold water and squeeze them dry in a cloth. Pound the herbs with the yolks of two hard-boiled eggs, a couple of boned anchovies, a spoonful of capers, and a saltspoonful of French mustard. After pounding it, add the yolks of two eggs, a pinch of salt and pepper, and work in a gill of salad oil, drop by drop, alternately with a tablespoonful of French tarragon and chili vinegars. Rub the sauce through a hair sieve, mix it with shred celery, beetroot, two shred gherkins, and a couple of shred boned anchovies. Pile the salad in a salad-bowl, garnish the surface with passed hard-boiled yolk of egg, and the border with slices of tomato and a strip of hard-boiled white of egg between each.

Pouding Parisien.—Put a piece of vanilla pod into a gill and a-half of milk to extract the flavour. Beat 3 ozs. of butter with 4 ozs. of sugar till it is creamy; mix it with the milk. After removing the vanilla, mix in 2 ozs. of flour and stir it till it boils, when it should have a very thick, creamy consistency, and must quite boil. Work in the yolks of four eggs, each one separately, and mix in lightly the stiffly whipped whites of five eggs. Steam the pudding three-quarters of an hour in a plain pipe mould, buttered and sprinkled with chopped and browned almonds and crushed ratafias. Serve it with small ratafias, stuck together with apricot jam in the centre and apricot sauce poured round it.

Pain d'Ananas à la Crême.—Infuse the rind of a ripe pine-apple in a pint of water, strain it, and convert the water into syrup with 8 ozs. of loaf sugar, in which dissolve ½ oz. of gelatine. Pound the fruit to a pulp with the juice of a lemon and rub it through a hair sieve; mix the purée with the syrup, add a tablespoonful of rum, and pour it into a fancy tube mould, previously set with jelly and chopped pistachios; place it in an ice cave or a large vessel surrounded with well-mixed ice and salt. Serve it with stiffly whipped cream in the centre.

Bouchées à la Karoly.—Make a choux paste thus:—Put a gill and a half of water into a stewpan with 2 ozs. of butter, a pinch of salt and cayenne pepper, stir in 3 ozs. of flour and ½ oz. of grated Parmesan cheese. When it quite boils, remove it from the stove and work in two whole eggs and a yolk. Press the paste through a plain tube into round balls on a buttered baking-sheet and bake them a delicate colour. Mix a small jar of caviare with the juice of half a lemon, 1 oz. of butter, and a spoonful of chopped parsley, and put it on ice until required. Cut a small piece from the top of each bouchée, fill them with the iced caviare, place a round piece of aspic jelly, cut with a fluted cutter, on the top, and dish them on a fancy paper garnished with sprigs of chervil.

LETTER FROM MADGE.

Dearest Amy.—You asked my advice about your gardener's son who has developed a talent for foundry work and has no opportunity of getting instruction in the village. In my town I asked a friend about it, and he at once recommended the International Correspondence Schools. As a consequence I paid a visit to their immense building in Kingsway, and spent one of the most interesting afternoons of my life in being shown the various sections of a wonderful undertaking. This great house is the sun of a system that sends out rays to the furthest parts of the earth. It has students everywhere, who are being taught by correspondence in science, mathematics, languages, professions and trades of every kind. The system under which all this is conducted is admirably complete. I wonder if I am clever enough to explain it, or begin to explain it all, to you. Take your protégé's case, for instance, foundry work. The way the school goes about getting the necessary text-books is this. They enquire all over England for the best practical worker in that business. When he is found, he is asked (and paid for doing it) to write down as clearly as possible all he knows about foundry work, with essential details. He is probably no writer, and his manuscript, when it reaches the schools, is very much in the rough. It is, therefore, handed to a member of the staff to be put into shape, and when this has been accomplished the corrected version is submitted to the original author, since in the course of revision errors in the technical part of the information may have crept in. When it is returned to the schools it forms the basis of the text book on that particular trade, but before being actually completed this text book is again submitted to the practical founder and undergoes certain tests which preclude any possibility of any misleading statements having been included.

That is pretty complete, isn't it? These outside experts are well paid for their labour in connection with the text-books, and the books themselves, being intended for students at home, are different from any others—extraordinarily complete, practical, and intelligible. There is no pons asinorum. The student is led step by step (and the steps are easy because shallow) from the elementary to the technical knowledge of his subject. Everything unnecessary is eliminated, but more of the necessaries are found in these text-books than in any others.

When a student enrols for a particular course he is sent the first two instruction papers, and with them every kind of helpful direction, also blank forms on which he may ask for special information, and addressed envelopes in which to send his work to Kingsway to be examined. When it arrives there it is received in the instruction department, examined, all errors marked, explanations given of anything that may have puzzled the student, and the paper is then returned to him, he, meanwhile, having been getting on with his second paper. At the end of each text-book is a list of questions which constitute an examination paper, and by his answers to these his progress is gauged.

Should your gardener's boy prove rather slow just at first in assimilating information, he need not feel rushed or hurried. The certificate of scholarship he will receive contains a guarantee that tuition will be given to him until he is qualified to receive a diploma, so that he can work along steadily and thoroughly, acquiring that sense of confidence and self-reliance that is often missed when learning viva voce in company with a number of others.

There are no fewer than two hundred specialised courses of instruction. Poultry farming is one of those that have been added recently. Commerce in all its branches is included, and not only the instruction merely, but advice is given by experts as to the outlook in the various branches of the commercial world with suggestions suitable to the inquirers' particular case. Languages are taught by gramaphone, and during my visit I had a short lesson in French. There was no mistaking the pure accent of the instructor whose voice had made the record, nor was there any doubt as to the painstaking character of his pronunciation. It is a pleasant and very easy way of learning languages. I well understand the spirit in which one of the students wrote that he found the system of the I.C.S. not only practical and simple but exhilarating.

Many thousands of men are now being given valuable technical training which will lift them out of the ruck and make their brains a valuable asset to the country, to say nothing of the improved conditions of life and work for the students themselves. There is an enormous demand among employers for I.C.S. students in every department of work, so make your protégé enrol at once.

You know how Fred always declares that there is no water like Apollinaris for bringing out the flavour of whisky, and if the judges at the Brussels Exhibition had been Englishmen one would have accounted for the awarding of the Grand Prix to the Apollinaris Company for their product by their sharing his belief. But being Belgians I presume they were guided by such considerations as purity and the water's own natural character in making the award. I am sure you will agree with me that it is deserved.

Winifred writes from Liverpool:—

This is the month of return from holidaying, and I also have come back in sad mood. When one has been strolling leisurely in the playing grounds of the Continent, has seen the sun on Lac Leman, has rowed idly on Lake Maggiore and Como, and has climbed the mountain way to old Gruyeres, the modern city, with its "brool" of commerce and trade, becomes charged with unreasonable haste and energy. Why can't we live beautifully, and slowly, and calmly, as they live in those other lands? I won't attempt to expound the questions I have asked lest it draw me to the thorny byeways of social discussion, but, courting safety, will tell you something about the Autumn Exhibition of Pictures in which we are all deeply interested here. We are uncommonly proud of our Art Galleries, and a suggestion that they be set apart for the exhibition of the works of a few selected artists is not welcomed. We are first of all a commercial city, great in shipyards, great in traffic by sea and land; but we have a large community of painters to whom the Walker Art Gallery is the centre of ambition, and the means whereby their work becomes known. May we long possess the exhibition of art for the people which the Walker Art Gallery gives us from year to year.

The opening ceremony was graced by the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress of London, and we are all in love with Lady Knill. Her charming courtesy, her beautiful little speech in which she spoke of the warmth and sunshine of art, of its inspirations and ideals, and of its beauty "taken from the hand of God," quite cheered our hearts. I hear that she is a granddaughter of Pugin, the famous church architect, and has great artistic gifts. Mr. John Lea, the Chairman of the Arts Committee, entertained Sir John and Lady Knill, and Mr. J. L. Griffiths, Consul-General for the United States of America in London, at his pretty place, Moseley Hill, during their visit. Other notable folk at the opening were the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress of Liverpool, Sir William and Lady Bowring, Mr. F. J. Leslie, Lady Forwood, Mr. E. R. Dibdin, the Curator, a greatgrandson by the way of the famous Dibdin who wrote "Tom Bowling," and many artist folk. A portrait of Mrs. Williams, the Lady Mayoress, who is so much liked among us, has a prominent place in the Exhibition. Among local artists who are exhibiting are Miss May Greville Cooksey, whose church painting is so widely known; Mrs. Thomas Goffey, who sends clever sketches of foreign lands. A charming pastel of Miss Fortesque is sent by Mr. C. D. Mackenzie, the gown and capote of white, in beautiful harmony with corn-coloured hair and fair delicate complexion. Mr. J. T. Watts, the poet painter of Nature in her most lovely moods, has several characteristic studies of trees and falling leaves and autumn shadows. Miss Agnes E. Foley, distinguished as a singer, shows a case of miniatures of great beauty, and Miss Hilda Goffey has a portrait of her father, which is marked by all her delicate and subtle observation.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

Dearest Madge,—The song writers and minor poets, yielding to the allurement of rhyme, are led to remember in September. Others, however, where there is no question of rhyming, also incline the same way. The month is essentially the slack one of the year, with no present to speak of, with everything more or less ended and nothing as yet beginning. The world of politics is in the "reculer pour mieux sauter" state, that of fashion can only occupy itself in wondering "What next." The season has not even the resource of the big gooseberry or the sea serpent; and the dish of strawberries and bunch of primroses, gathered in the "open," have to wait for the far end of Christmas time. In fact, there is nothing to do but remember, and many a picturesque and out of the world spot on our island is well suited for doing it in.

This is, perhaps, the season which gives books their greatest opportunity—that is, with those who have not sloughed off the book habit in the strenuousness of modern life. One has time for reading—real, not scrappy reading—for the delights, as regards fiction, of a good old novel by a good old author, with a thoughtfully worked out story, and a beginning, a middle, and an end. The kind of book of which one of our modern sages would fain have had ten volumes instead of only three. Is there any such complete way of shaking off "the dust of the actual" as that of wandering in the "Never-never land" of books?

The tourist really has his happiest time over here in a fine autumn. It is matchless in the wooded lake countries of Kerry, Sligo, Erne, and Rostrevor. Such tints, especially where the wild cherry, maple, and ash prevail. At Rostrevor Sir John Ross of Bladensburg has a fine collection of shrubs and plants. He is a skilled botanist, and has introduced many rare plants from distant climes into Ireland. It is only lately that we have found out what a garden of delights we might botanically make of Ireland with its mild and moist climate. All sorts and kinds of plants from distant lands seem to take kindly to the country when they are given the chance.

Lord Rathmore has been having his usual golf season at Grenore, not far from Rostrevor, where his nephew, Mr. Justice Barton, also devotes his holiday to the "links." The Lord Chancellor is in Dublin now, returned to the cares of office from his fishing holiday. Lord Aberdeen's departure has placed him in the position of a Lord Justice governing Ireland during the Viceregal absence. Mr. R. and Lady Gwendolen Guinness are setting out for America, in especial to visit Canada and spend some months in touring. Lady Buchan has been staying with her daughter, Lady Evelyn Guinness, in Ireland, where all Lord Iveagh's sons, except the eldest, have residences in the near neighbourhood of Farmleigh.—Yours ever, Clare.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

My New Magazine

An Open Letter to the Public by

T. P. O'CONNOR

In announcing a new magazine I make no apology. But an apology would be needed if I contemplated adding one more to the typical magazines published to-day. My new magazine is founded on a faith that there are many thousands of people who are not content with the modern magazine—who are disappointed with its constant avoidance of the subjects that really matter. It is not necessary to apologise to such a public, for they realise the need for efficiency; indeed, the world has no use for the ill-informed; the men and women who count nowadays are those who are conversant with modern ideas and movements—in short, progress is so rapid that unless they are constantly in touch with these they are left behind in the race. A magazine planned to meet the needs of this healthy, enquiring, knowledgeable mind may be said to inaugurate a new era in the magazine world.

Knowledge is power—and there is a knowledge to be gained by intelligently viewing the constantly changing panorama of life and its many activities. My new magazine will aim at reviewing the passing show intelligently, by comment, informative articles, shrewd portraits of personalities, and sound criticisms, so that the busy man or woman shall, month by month, obtain a clear grasp of the significance of the world's thought and activity.

The things that matter to men and women—that is the keynote of the magazine I have planned and which I know is wanted. I shall avoid dulness and prosiness. Every page will be vital. Every month there will be articles on political personalities and social problems; science, literature, and art will receive adequate attention; phases of life and thought affecting the sphere of women will be treated by authoritative writers; while each number will contain many practical pages for students. English and Continental story-tellers will give my readers fiction that will illuminate the problems of life, and a magazine which aims at being a sincere reflex of the life of the month will also be leavened by the work of humourists both in prose and verse. Such a magazine will not only provide information for busy men and women, it will provide entertainment, and, at the same time, act as an auxiliary and companion to the daily paper.

"The first biography of a notable monarch Dr. Rappoport has contrived to render full justice to his subject. The dominant passion of his life was a selfishness so intense, so overmastering, that one would like to believe that it is without a parallel in modern times. He was a monster of greed. His domestic life was a public scandal. His treatment of his wife and of his daughters was criminal" DAILY GRAPHIC.

"Max is undoubtedly an exceptional young woman, beautiful, daring, talented, and possessed of an extraordinary purpose. Between Maxine the princess and Max the boy-artist the changes are excellently rung. Readers who know their night-time Paris will enjoy revisiting haunts in which much of the action passes. Mrs. Thurston has entirely caught the atmosphere, the glitter, the restlessness of the life lived by the laughing, unhappy souls of the demi-monde. As a work of literary art it is ambitious and clever" DAILY CHRONICLE.

THE LOVE AFFAIRS OF LORD BYRON

By FRANCIS GRIBBLE

(Author of "George Sand and Her Lovers," etc.)

That we should have enlisted the sympathetic pen of Mr. Francis Gribble to limn for us the life and love affairs of that most romantic and picturesque personality Lord Byron, is a guarantee of a biographical study of supreme interest. His book is a complete Life of Byron, written with special reference to those romantic incidents in the poet's career which inspired so much of his verse. It incorporates a great amount of information which was not accessible at the time when the well-known Lives by Moore, Elze and Cordy Jeaffreson were written, and there is an elaborate and impartial examination of the charges brought against Byron's memory by his grandson, the late Lord Lovelace.

REFEREE.—"It contains thirty stories, all of which are interesting, and some of which are very good indeed."

THE JEWISH WORLD.—"A splendid exchange for a shilling."

WESTERN DAILY PRESS.—"Very engrossing. They are 'queer' stories in that practically every one ends in an unexpected way, and contains a good surprise."

BAZAAR.—"This latest series should have as large a circulation as those which have preceded it."

SPORTSMAN.—"We need not commend them; they are well known to be entertaining."

ULSTER GUARDIAN.—"There are no short stories to compare with those which appear weekly in TRUTH, and we cannot think of a better shillingsworth of holiday fiction than one of the volumes. . . . which contain thirty of the brightest and best of these famous stories."

SUSSEX DAILY NEWS.—"A brilliant shillingsworth. Practically every one of the thirty stories it contains is of much more than ordinary interest. They are of that happy magnetism which compels the reading of the whole story once the first page has been scanned."

WORCESTER HERALD.—"Brighter reading for the railway carriage or the odd half-hour anywhere cannot be found."

THE NORTHERN WHIG.—"244 pages of true enjoyment."

CORK EXAMINER.—"Extraordinary value for the modest sum charged for the book."

NOTTINGHAM GUARDIAN.—"Comes opportunely to serve for holiday and seaside reading."

SPORTING LIFE.—"Better holiday fare it would be difficult to find. The stories are, needless to say, varied and bright, and form an exceptionally good shillingsworth."

FINANCIAL TIMES.—"May be recommended to those who are taking their holidays."

HOSPITAL.—"We strongly recommend this excellent shillingsworth."

FINANCIER.—"Well up to the level of excellence established by the first volume of this always entertaining series."

BRITISH COLUMBIA ELECTRIC RAILWAY CO., LTD.

24th September, 1910.

To the Holders of the 4½ PER CENT. BRITISH COLUMBIA ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY, LIMITED (VANCOUVER POWER) DEBENTURES.

Dear Sir (or Madam),

My Directors have determined to offer to the Holders of the 4½ per Cent. Vancouver Power Debentures of this Company the right to exchange each £100 Vancouver Power Debenture for £102½ of the Company's 4½ per Cent. Perpetual Consolidated Debenture Stock and a cash payment of £1 in respect of interest. Fractions of £1 will be paid in cash.

As the present market price of the 4½ per Cent. Debenture Stock is 103½ ex interest and there is a free market in the Stock, and the present market price of the Vancouver Power Debentures is 101½ with only a restricted market, this offer (including the cash payment) to the Holders of the Vancouver Power Debentures is equivalent to a premium of 5½ per cent. on the amount of the Debentures held by them, in addition to which they will be obtaining a readily marketable security in exchange for one in which the market is restricted.

My Directors reserve the right to withdraw this offer at any date after November 1, 1910.

The Vancouver Power Debentures delivered up to the Company in exchange for the Debenture Stock of the Railway Company will, under the terms of the Trust Deed securing such Debenture Stock be kept alive and transferred to the Trustees of the said Trust Deed as additional security for the said Debenture Stock until the whole of the Vancouver Power Debentures have been so exchanged or redeemed, when the mortgages securing the same will be cancelled.

The interest on the Vancouver Power Debentures is payable half-yearly on the 15th January and 15th July in each year. The interest on the Debenture Stock is payable on the 31st March and 30th September in each year. In order that the new Debenture Stock may rank pari passu in all respects with that already issued and quoted and be good delivery on the Stock Exchange, the Debenture Stock to be issued in exchange will carry the full half-year's interest from the 30th September, 1910, to the 31st March, 1911, and a cash payment of £1 per £100 Debenture will be made in respect of interest on the Vancouver Power Debentures from the 15th July to the 30th September, 1910. The exchange will therefore take effect from the 30th September, 1910.

My Directors will be obliged if you will indicate on the form, which can be obtained at the Company's offices, whether you are prepared to exchange the Debentures held by you for the new Debenture Stock on the terms above stated.

By Order of the Board,

34, Nicholas Lane, London, E.C. HIRAM WILLIAMS, Assistant Secretary.

"TRUTH" DOLL AND TOY SHOW.

PRELIMINARY NOTICE.

It seems early days yet to be reminding my readers of an event which is still some months ahead. But the fact that a large number of dolls are still crying aloud for clothes, impels me to direct the attention of TRUTH'S lady friends to their condition, and to the fact that they will be required for exhibition at the Albert Hall in the middle of December, prior to distribution among the London Poor Law Schools and Hospitals.

I hope that many ladies will take pity on the poor dolls, and forward their applications as soon as possible. The usual prizes for the dressing of the dolls will, of course, be awarded after the Show.

HOME-MADE TOYS.

The exhibits in this class last year did not come up to expectations. This year special efforts will be made to stimulate amateur toy-makers to take part in the Competition. With that object in view the Editor of TRUTH has decided (assuming the entries warrant it) to give a Special Prize for

HOME-MADE DOLLS' HOUSES,

in addition to the usual Prizes offered in the Home-Made Toys Class.

He desires me now to direct particular notice to this, as he is of opinion that the making of Dolls' Houses is an art in which amateur talent is likely to find congenial scope for its exercise. Moreover, a Dolls' House is a peculiarly serviceable sort of plaything for children, both because it is one in the delights of which several can share simultaneously, and also because it is better able to withstand the wear and tear of daily use than smaller and more fragile toys.

A further and more detailed announcement of the Show will appear in due course. Meanwhile, let readers of TRUTH make a careful note of the date, which is Wednesday and Thursday, December 14 and 15, 1910.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best EPIGRAM, CONUNDRUM, LIPOGRAM, BOUTS-RIMÉS, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a quarter to the same competitor.

7. ALL NEW CONTRIBUTORS ARE REQUIRED TO FORWARD WITH THEIR FIRST ANSWERS THEIR REAL NAMES AND ADDRESSES FOR REGISTRATION; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed twelve, and must under no circumstances consist of more than fourteen, letters.

9. COMPETITORS MUST ON NO ACCOUNT CHANGE THE NOMS-DE-PLUME THEY HAVE ONCE ASSUMED.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed:—

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, NO. 1,650.

I will begin by asking my competitors to assume the case of a diffident young man who is deeply enamoured of a charming young lady, and resolves to make her an offer of marriage by letter. But, being in some doubt as to the lady's sentiments towards himself, he is fearful of her taking offence at his boldness, and, consequently, of an estrangement resulting, which will put an end to their existing friendship.

Influenced by these considerations, he sets himself to word his letter in such a way that, if she is really éprise with him, and reads between the lines with the sympathetic eye of love, she will have no difficulty in taking his real meaning; whereas, if, on the other hand, she is indifferent to him, and merely reads his letter with the cold eye of common-sense, she will see in it no more than an ordinarily friendly epistle.

He finds his task more difficult than he had imagined. Indeed, the composition of the fateful letter costs him several anxious days and sleepless nights. But at length he produces something tolerably adequate to the purpose.

Now I invite competitors to put themselves in the place of this young man, with the offer of the usual Prize of Two Guineas for

A LETTER, OF NOT MORE THAN 150 WORDS, WHICH SHALL BEST ANSWER THE REQUIREMENTS SPECIFIED.

N.B.—The address and date—if any—at the head of the letter need not be included within the limit of words laid down. But everything else must be included within that limit, even to the writer's signature. In the last-named each initial will count as a word.

I may add that there is no need at all to go up to the full 150 words. Indeed, the shorter the letter is the better—always provided it answers the purpose specified.

No competitor may submit more than one letter; and all letters must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, October 10.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MALIGNANT.—I am sorry the printer made such a hash of your "partridges." I note the needful corrections, and will, of course, take them into account when adjudicating.

SIMPLEX.—Many thanks for your suggestions. I hope to adopt one or other of them shortly. I seem to think that you must have been recently studying that interesting little work, Farrar's "Greek Syntax," which I used to know by heart in my school and Oxford days.

ANSWERS TO SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT PRIZE-AWARD QUERIES.

SAPPER.—1. Longest word was Sonnenbergerstrasse. 2. CRESCENDO'S anagram of "Sackville Mechano-Therapeutic Institute"—"I invent step to kill acute rheumatic aches," may be quoted as a successful one.

MRS. B.—1. The best progressive sentence submitted was as follows:—"I am now only using Odonto because Rowlands' agreeable dentifrice experiences unparalleled, unprecedented representative recommendations. 2. See answer to SAPPER above.

PIER PENILES.—The advertisement in the issue of TRUTH in which Question VIII. was set, contained several places which are almost exactly Antipodean, e.g., Buenos Aires and Port Arthur, Lhasa and Sorata, Belfast and Dunedin (N. Z.), and others.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE King and Queen have decided to postpone their departure from Balmoral until Monday evening. Their Majesties are to travel from Ballater to Euston in the London and North-Western Royal train. The King has reverted to Queen Victoria's custom of always travelling by night in her journeys to and from Scotland, and of proceeding by the west coast route. King Edward invariably travelled by day, both when going north and when returning south, and he used the east coast route for the down journey and came back by the west coast. The King and Queen are to be at Waterloo Station on Tuesday morning to say good-bye to the Duke and Duchess of Connaught and Princess Patricia when they leave for Portsmouth to embark for South Africa.

It has been announced that the King "has no intention of restoring the private chapel in Balmoral Castle." As a matter of fact there has been no need for a "private chapel" at Balmoral since the death of Queen Victoria. During the eighties an apartment in the Castle was fitted up for "worship" on Sunday mornings when the Queen was prevented by wet or stormy weather from going to Crathie Kirk. The service on such occasions had previously been conducted in the dining-room, beginning at ten o'clock and lasting for an hour. King Edward always attended the morning "worship" at Crathie on Sundays, so he caused Queen Victoria's "service room" to be dismantled, and it was afterwards made into a billiard and smoking-room. The walls of this room are panelled with highly polished firwood from Ballochbuie Forest. King George and the Queen follow King Edward's practice of going to church at Crathie on Sunday mornings.

Some of the papers have reproduced the nonsensical fictions which have appeared in the French and German press about King George's alleged intention of visiting Frankfort during the autumn. It has been stated that his Majesty is to be the guest of Prince and Princess Frederick Charles of Hesse at Friedrichshof, where he will meet the Emperor William and the Emperor Nicholas. Of course, the whole story is a pure invention.

In other directions attempts have been made to raise a fuss about Mr. Balfour's visit to their Majesties at Balmoral, which is said to have excited "intense public interest." It has been the custom ever since the death of George the Fourth for the Sovereign to receive visits in the country from leading members of the Opposition, but no political importance has ever been attached to them in any responsible quarter. Lord Lansdowne would have been invited to Balmoral if he had happened to be staying in Scotland, but as he is in Ireland his visit to Court will take place at Windsor Castle next month. I only wonder that a similar cackle was not heard after Lord Rosebery's visit to Balmoral.

The Queen made two excursions from Balmoral last week, accompanied by several members of the house party staying at the Castle. The first was to Dunnottar Castle, one of the most romantic ruins in Scotland. Dunnottar was the stronghold of the Keiths, Earls Mareschal of Scotland, and it stands on a rock, separated from the mainland by a deep chasm. There is an immense square tower. The Queen's second expedition was to visit Lord and Lady Aberdeen at Cromar House, and her Majesty was accompanied by a considerable party, including the Duke of Connaught, who spent last week at Balmoral.

The King is going to Sandringham for a week or ten days on Thursday, the 20th, and his Majesty will reside at York Cottage during his stay. The object of the visit is to transact estate business, as the King has not visited Sandringham since his accession, and he will shoot over some of the outlying preserves. His Majesty will stop at King's Lynn on his way to Sandringham in order that he may be presented with an address from the Mayor and Corporation.

I hear that the Sandringham estate has been left by King Edward to King George, the Hall being assigned to Queen Alexandra as a dower house, and, of course, she has the gardens and park at her disposal. The late King presumably made provision for the place being kept up at the expense of the estate. It is understood to have been King Edward's wish that Sandringham Hall should become a permanent Royal residence in the future, and it was with this view that the house had been so much enlarged of late years. The statement that the Sandringham preserves "have been placed at the King's disposal by Queen Alexandra" is incorrect. I understand that King George has the shooting on the Royal estate in Norfolk entirely in his own hands.

Great surprise has been excited by the publication of a considerable list of additional appointments to Queen Alexandra's household, and there is much astonishment at her Majesty having provided herself with a Mistress of the Robes. If Queen Alexandra proposes to make herself a conspicuous figure at State and Court ceremonials it will be necessary to revise some of the existing regulations as to etiquette and precedence. It has been the practice for a Queen Dowager to live in retirement, and Queen Adelaide never put herself forward in any way after her husband's death, and she was very rarely seen on any public occasion. It is only in Russia that the widow of a sovereign has ever continued to be a prominent figure at Court. The Empress Marie has been conspicuous and active since her husband's death, and Queen Alexandra appears disposed to follow her sister's example.

The Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife are to leave Mar Lodge for the season the week after next, when they will come up to their house in Portman Square for a short time. They are going abroad with their daughter for the winter in November, and will probably spend a few months in Upper Egypt, but their plans are not yet definitely settled. There has been some idea of H.R.H. and the Duke going to the West Indies for four months.

I last week contradicted the revived report of a contemplated marriage between the King of Portugal and Princess Alexandra of Fife. There has since been a cataract of paragraphs in the press announcing that a marriage may take place between Princess Alexandra and Prince Christopher of Greece, youngest son of the King and Queen of the Hellenes. This is another nonsensical fiction. A weekly journal mentions that "the younger Princes of Greece have only small fortunes." The fact is that the Princes George and Nicholas have both married very rich wives, and as their only sister is the wife of a wealthy Russian Grand Duke it will be easy for King George and Queen Olga to give handsome fortunes to their other sons (Princes Andrew and Christopher), besides making adequate provision for the Duke of Sparta, who will succeed to his father's throne. Queen Olga had a very large fortune when she married, and King George has accumulated great wealth by a long series of successful speculations in various branches of commerce. He is an excellent man of business.

The Queen of Sweden has been spending a month in Germany. Her Majesty has been the guest of her brother and sister-in-law (who is also her cousin) the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Baden, at Karlsruhe, and of her mother, the Grand Duchess Dowager (Princess Louise of Prussia), at her château on the Island of Mainau, in the Lake of Constance. The Queen of Sweden is to spend the winter and spring months in Italy, and the Crown Princess will officiate in her place as First Lady of the Court of Stockholm.

Prince Arthur of Connaught is to spend the winter at York with his regiment, the Royal Scots Greys, which has just removed thither from Tidworth. Prince Arthur is going to Scotland on a visit to the Duke of Richmond and Gordon at Gordon Castle, where he will have some salmon fishing on the Spey.

Prince Henry of Prussia postponed his return to Germany at the last moment in order that he might spend a few days with Lord and Lady Newton at Lyme Park. Lyme is one of the finest and most beautiful domains in England. The estate has belonged to the Leghs since the reign of Richard II., when the lands of Lyme Handley were granted by the Crown to Sir Piers Legh, who was beheaded at Chester two years afterwards (in 1399) by the Duke of Lancaster, and his son and successor (Sir Peter) was killed at Agincourt. The house is an imposing quadrangular building of several different dates. The drawing-room, the "stag" parlour, the gallery, and the staircase are all very handsome and striking. The park has been wisely left in its natural condition, and it contains large herds of red and fallow deer. There is some of the finest timber in England, and splendid avenues and groves of limes and oaks. Lyme Park is a genuine old chase, combining both hill and dale with stately woods and tracts of heath covered with gorse and fern.

Prince Henry also paid a brief visit to the Duke and Duchess of Beaufort at Badminton House. In the morning his Royal Highness went out cub-hunting, and took part in a capital run, after which he was presented with the brush. Before luncheon there was an impromptu shooting party in the park, and several hundreds of rabbits were killed. Luncheon was served at the Worcester Lodge, and the afternoon was spent on the golf links. The party drank tea in a tent which had been placed in the famous beech avenue.

Princess Christian has arrived at Cumberland Lodge from Aix-les-Bains, and Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein has returned from Germany. Princess Christian will probably spend the early spring months of next year in the south of Europe.

Princess Henry of Battenberg has been visiting the Empress Eugénie at Farnborough Hill and the Duke and Duchess of Connaught at Bagshot Park. Prince Leopold of Battenberg is now staying at Osborne Cottage with his mother. Princess Henry will leave the Isle of Wight for the season towards the end of the month, and it is probable that she will spend part of the winter in Italy and Spain.

The Emperor Francis Joseph has been residing at the Castle of Schönbrunn, near Vienna, since he left Ischl, and that place is to be his headquarters until next summer. The Emperor drives daily to the Hofburg, where he spends several hours in transacting business and giving audiences. His Majesty is expected at Buda-Pest shortly for a week or ten days, and it is hoped that he will be able to spend a few days at Gödöllö, his favourite hunting seat in Hungary.

The Countess Somers, who died on Thursday at the age of eighty-four, was a daughter of Mr. James Pattle, of the Bengal Civil Service. She married the late Lord Somers in 1850, and for over thirty years afterwards she was a prominent figure in the crême de la crême of English society. Lady Somers was widely known by her charming manner, her accomplishments, her bright and varied talk, and her genuine kindness. She combined grace, refinement, tact, and heart; and nobody was less banale. Lady Somers was the mother of Adeline Duchess of Bedford and Lady Henry Somerset, both of whom have been for many years active in practical benevolence and all kinds of good works.

Mr. John Fell, of Ulverston, who died last week, was for half a century one of the most prominent figures in the public life of North Lancashire. He belonged to a very ancient family—the Fells of Daltongate—who descend from the Fells of Redman Hall, who held their estate for nineteen generations. He took a very active and useful part in every branch of local business, succeeding the seventh Duke of Devonshire as chairman of the Ulverston Board of Guardians and Lord Cross as chairman of the Lancashire Quarter Sessions. He was much interested in the extensive fisheries of the district, which he greatly improved by his expert knowledge and zeal. He was one of the founders of Barrow-in-Furness, and was in many ways a benefactor to that flourishing town. Mr. Fell was a strong Liberal until 1886, when he joined the Unionists, but in 1905 he went back to his old party.

Lady Forestier-Walker, who died last week, will be much missed in Monmouthshire, as she was a prominent figure in county society, and took a most active part in many charitable and philanthropic movements. Lady Forestier-Walker was a daughter of the late Mr. R. D. Chamberlain, and she was married about thirteen years ago to Sir George Forestier-Walker, of Castleton. He is a first cousin of Lord Tredegar, and a grandson of the first baronet, who greatly distinguished himself during the Peninsular War.

The death of Mr. James R. Graham will be much regretted in Cumberland, as he was one of the most popular residents in the county, and he took a prominent part in local affairs. He was a keen sportsman and a fine shot. He was the youngest son of the late Sir Frederick and Lady Hermione Graham, and had for many years acted as chief agent for his brother, Sir Richard Graham, the owner of the extensive Netherby estate.

Judging from his "open letters" to the Prime Minister, Lord Charles Beresford has been saturating himself with the "scare" literature of the day, and has allowed it to get on his nerves. With his excitable temperament and his technical knowledge, he seems qualified to make a hit with an "invasion" novel in a penny weekly, but it is a pity that he should pose as a serious politician. The basis of his terrors is that in "the year 1913-1914" Germany, Austria, and Italy will have between them twenty-nine "Dreadnoughts" to our thirty-four. Even to arrive at this alarming state of things he has to rule out two of our colonial battleships, though why three continental navies should combine against us and our Colonies refuse to join us he does not attempt to explain.

The absurdity of the calculation, however, lies in the marshalling of the navies of these three powers for an attack upon the United Kingdom. Lord Charles Beresford is apparently unaware that the Triple Alliance has been in existence for about a quarter of a century, that it was formed for the purpose of securing the peace of central Europe by opposing an irresistible barrier to any renewal of the attacks of France on her eastern neighbour, and that it has served that purpose ever since to the benefit of all Europe, ourselves included. It may surprise Lord Charles to learn that under the guidance of the late Lord Salisbury, who was quite an intelligent statesman, we assisted in the formation of the Triple Alliance, by giving assurances to the Italians that in the event of the Alliance finding itself at war we would protect the Italian coast against the French fleet. Whether we were wise in meddling in the business at all is open to question. But the fact remains that we gave a qualified support to the formation of this league in the interest of European peace, and that the step has been justified by the result.

If Lord Charles Beresford knew as much about other matters as he does about handling warships, he would know that the Triple Alliance as it stands can no more be diverted from its original purpose for a joint attack upon Great Britain than for the purpose of an attack upon the United States or Brazil. An entirely new treaty between the three powers would be necessary for that purpose, and the idea of Italy entering into it under present circumstances is preposterous—doubly so when it is remembered that our undertaking to protect Italy with our navy was one of the bases of the original Alliance. Everybody knows that the adherence of Italy to the original terms of the Alliance has more than once become doubtful; and the idea of Italy joining with the other two allies in a war with this country, while France and her navy are standing aloof, is simply childish; yet this idea is the basis of all Lord Charles Beresford's calculations. Such are the sort of arguments used for setting up a new "three-power" naval standard, and demanding an immediate huge addition to our ever-increasing naval estimates.

It is very noble and patriotic of veteran warriors, convinced that the Service is going to the dogs, to station themselves on the housetops and warn us in stentorian tones of our impending destruction. But these elderly alarmists are also a trifle ridiculous, and when they take to bawling at Prime Ministers and dictating peremptorily that this or that must be done at once if the country is to be saved, they are in danger of becoming a nuisance. No country can allow its soldiers and sailors to decide for it what size its army or navy should be, or how much money should be spent on them. It is desirable to consult experts on these matters, but certainly not to be ruled by them.

It would be well if this view of the matter received more attention both from the experts, who are so fond of volunteering their advice, and the public, which is apt to pay too much attention to them. In private life a man does not, unless he is a fool, ask his coachman to decide how many horses he should keep or how many helpers are required in the stables, nor does he enlarge his garden, build new hot-houses, and take on additional hands because his head gardener thinks these measures absolutely necessary. The same principle holds in public life. Admirals and Generals are the servants of the State. The master of the house may consult them about their business, but if he allows them to decide the size of his establishment or the amount of money he is to spend, he will very soon find himself in the bankruptcy court. He certainly will not allow them to give their advice on these matters until he asks for it. And quite the last thing he will stand is for a man whom he has pensioned off to come and lecture him upon the imperative necessity of his immediately enlarging both his establishment and his expenditure.

I was particularly interested in Lord Charles Beresford's second letter on the protection of our commerce in war. It bears out exactly what I said the other day about that precious weapon of offence, the right to capture an enemy's commerce. We are bidden to hold fast to this weapon as the only means of injuring any foreign country that we may quarrel with. Yet here we have a leading naval expert, and one of our champion alarmists, enlarging on the dire peril in which our commerce stands should we find ourselves at war without two or three times the number of cruisers we possess at present. In fact, it would seem from Lord Charles's letter that we must have war ships patrolling all the ocean highways of the world as closely as policemen in the streets of London. Before we spend a hundred millions for this purpose it would be only elementary common sense to consider whether the "right of capture," which we alone among the nations uphold, is not much more disadvantageous to ourselves than it is ever likely to be to an enemy.

Probably the descriptive writers of the German and British press have exaggerated, after their custom, the seriousness of the Berlin riots. But considering what a very law-abiding, peaceable people the Germans have always been, these disturbances are particularly interesting to English people at the present juncture. "Tariff reform means security" was the text of the Daily Express on the morning after the riots began. The very next column was filled with the story from Berlin of the desperate encounter between the police and the mob, the wrecking of houses, the hurling of furniture from the windows, and the sacking of a church, among other incidents. And tariff reform, which means "security," and which is the only guaranteed, unfailing remedy for the progress of Socialism, is mainly recommended for our adoption on the strength of the beneficent results of protective tariffs in Germany.

One of the most interesting facts about the German riots is the little strike out of which they sprang. It seems that the coal porters who are out receive 5d. an hour. They are striking for 5½d. To defeat this monstrous demand "blacklegs" are imported, and the usual machinery of strike-breaking under police protection set to work. It is twenty-one years since London was agitated by the great dock strike. The London docker was out for a "tanner," and he got it. Yet to-day the Berlin coal porter is battling for a halfpenny less. A little fact of this kind is worth many sheets of "reports" from tariff reform excursionists.

I say nothing of the difference between the purchasing power of 5½d. in Berlin and 6d. in London. Our tariff reform trippers fail to notice that. The Germans themselves, however, seem to be painfully conscious of it. Last week the Berlin Municipal Council unanimously called on the Government to open the frontiers to the free importation of meat. In our happier land tariff reform means cheaper food.

Another curious phenomenon in Germany is the way the Socialists continue to win parliamentary seats at every by-election, in spite of the beneficent influence of the tariffs. A few weeks ago some of our well-informed London journals proclaimed that the Socialist movement in Germany had received its quietus from the split at the Magdeburg Convention. Last week the extinguished Socialists captured a seat at Frankfort-on-Oder—a small provincial town without much of an industrial element in its population. It looks as if they would sweep the country if a general election took place at this moment. However, let us never forget that a scientific tariff on the German model is our only refuge against Socialism in this country.

RUNNING AMOK.

(From an English Correspondent in Berlin.)

In the City of Berlin
You must be extremely careful what you do,
And look out you mind your every "p" and "q,"
For those little gods of tin,
The Fatherland's police, are hasty gents,
And easily provoked to take offence
In the City of Berlin.

In the City of Berlin
If a Press-man by some luckless chance you are,
The riding in a harmless motor-car
Is unpardonable sin.
(The commission of a murder's not so bad.)
They go for you like buffaloes when mad
In the City of Berlin.

In the City of Berlin
They will ride you down with more than Dervish dash,
They will cut, and they will thrust, and they will slash.
Aye, when they once begin,
They run amok alike with sword and shot,
And hack you, whether innocent or not,
In the City of Berlin.

In the City of Berlin
If they wish to have their Peace's guardians taught
To keep their heads, as Peace's guardians ought,
'Mid riot and 'mid din;
And if they'd have these panic-frenzied elves
Learn not to make wild asses of themselves
In the City of Berlin;

From the City of Berlin
They should be despatched to London for a course
Of training with the members of our "Force";
And on this my faith I'll pin,
That, when they've watched our peelers at their job,
They'll know better how to treat a harmless mob
In the City of Berlin.

In view of recent ebullitions of Unionist unrest, Mr. Balfour's speech to-day will be particularly interesting. His party is crying aloud for a clear lead on all sorts of ticklish questions. There are Tariff Reformers who now want definite and detailed information about the policy they have been supporting for six or seven years. Full particulars of Mr. Balfour's plan for dealing with the land question are urgently demanded, and he is told that unless he wishes to damp the fighting spirit of the ranks of the party (for whom the landowners speak with the utmost confidence) he must proclaim his intention to repeal the new taxes. On the Osborne judgment and payment of members he is also called upon to make his orders "straight, clear, definite." Well, we must wait for to-morrow's papers to see how Mr. Balfour deals with the appeals and admonitions of his restive followers. But he has become accustomed to such embarrassing attentions, and probably his elusiveness will again be equal to the occasion.

Meanwhile it is amusing to note that the party is at sixes and sevens over the payment of members question. Half the Tory papers strenuously advocate the proposal and the others as fiercely denounce it. The Daily Telegraph, in particular, views with "scorn and disapprobation" a change of attitude which looks so "perilously like time-serving." The Daily Mail suggests that only those members should be paid who claim a salary on the express ground of want of means, and that the payment should, moreover, be a charge upon the rates of the member's constituency. A legal friend reminds me that this would be in effect a reversion to an old practice. He writes:—

> Lord Campbell, in his "Life of Lord Chancellor Nottingham," says the latter decided that the obligation on constituencies to pay wages to their representatives in the House of Commons still continued. "After the dissolution of Parliament in 1681 Thomas King, Esq., late member for Harwich, presented a petition stating 'that he had served as burgesse in Parliament for the said borough several years, and did give his constant attendance therein; but that the said borough had not paid him his wages though often requested so to do.' Notice being given to the corporation of Harwich and the facts being verified the Lord Chancellor ordered the writ to issue de expensis burgensium levandis." Lord Campbell, writing many years after the first Reform Act was passed, said he knew of no reason in point of law why any member should not insist upon payment of his wages.

It is a little curious that no M.P. in modern times has attempted to put the law in motion for the payment of his wages. Although his constituents might not be pleased with the writ, that need not trouble him if he was not seeking re-election. However, the proposal that the payment should be restricted to the cases of members who claim to be paid is quite untenable, and so, too, is the idea that this expenditure should be borne by the local ratepayers rather than by the Imperial Exchequer.

The appointment of Dr. Fry to the vacant deanery of Lincoln will meet with general approval, and the new Bishop will find him a most congenial and zealous colleague. Dr. Fry's career has been scholastic, and since 1887 he has been headmaster of Berkhampsted School, which has flourished greatly under his judicious and enterprising guidance. He has always taken a keen interest in Church affairs, particularly in connection with social questions of all kinds, and he is a Broad Churchman, with a large toleration for other schools of thought. Dr. Fry has all his life been active as a Liberal, his political views being advanced and uncompromising. He has been zealous in correcting Church and other abuses. He is an excellent preacher, and he has been very successful as an organiser. Dr. Fry belongs to a well-known Somersetshire family, and he is a grandson of the once famous "Fry of Emberton," a pillar of the old Evangelical party, who was the first schoolmaster of Samuel Wilberforce. The Deanery of Lincoln is worth £2,000 a year, with an excellent residence.

One of the papers, in referring to the late Dean Wickham, states that he was appointed to Lincoln by Mr. Gladstone, "who was his father-in-law." For years before Dr. Wickham was selected for this well-earned preferment his promotion to either a bishopric or a deanery had been generally expected, and his appointment was received with universal and hearty approval. The fact is, however, that it was Queen Victoria who herself proposed Dr. Wickham to Mr. Gladstone as the most suitable divine to succeed Dean Butler. The late Queen took a keen interest in the affairs of Wellington College, and she was fully aware of the headmaster's strong claims on Crown preferment. Mr. Gladstone would never have sent up his son-in-law's name to the Queen, but it was another matter when her late Majesty proposed the appointment.

Mr. W. G. C. Gladstone has presented the Rev. F. S. M. Bennett, vicar of Christ Church, Chester, and formerly private secretary to Bishop Jayne, to the rectory of Hawarden, vacant by the much lamented death of Canon Drew. This living was formerly worth about £3,500 a year, and the gross income at present is nearly £2,400. There are now six churches to be maintained, and the outgoings are so heavy that the benefice can be held only by an ecclesiastic possessed of adequate private means. It is well known that during Canon Drew's incumbency his parochial expenditure exceeded his receipts by several thousands of pounds. Mr. Gladstone has found much difficulty in filling up the living, and if another fortnight had elapsed without an appointment being made by him, the patronage would have passed by lapse to the Bishop of the diocese.

Sub-Dean Duckworth has replaced Canon Henson, rector of St. Margaret's, as the Canon-in-Residence at Westminster Abbey. The Dean is again in residence.

Some people will think that in discussing physical degeneracy the Church Congress was travelling outside its province. That is not my opinion, and indeed the discussion on "heredity and responsibility" showed very clearly that the subject is one on which the clergy need to be inculcated with sound scientific doctrine. There was much wild and whirling talk about the increase of degeneracy in modern times, whereas in fact there are no data upon which any such pessimistic conclusion can be definitely based. It is no doubt true that the humanitarianism of the present age tends to give increased stability to the lives of mental and physical defects, but to imagine that the laws of nature can be altered by human legislation so that the fit should be eliminated by the unfit is a proposition which only needs to be stated in set terms to make its absurdity apparent. Still, anything which can be done to lessen the burden of supporting the unfit by their segregation and restraint from marriage is worthy consideration, and failing legislation it is as well to have the moral influence of the clergy actively exerted to this end.

A MISNOMER.

(The Bishop of Stepney, at the Church Congress, spoke of "the dreary land of the crank and the freak.")

Talk of cranks and freaks as "dreary"?
'Tis a funny statement, that!
Quite beyond me. Deary! Deary!
What's his lordship driving at?

Cranks and freaks who beat no dumb drum
Are of fun a constant mine.
"Dreary" rather are the humdrum
Folks who toe convention's line.

Dull the world would be, if wiser,
Reft of half its brightest smiles,
Should you take away the Kaiser
Or abolish Eustace Miles.

Where were food for cachinnations
In the cult of hide-bound law?
Where the gaiety of nations,
Minus Chesterton and Shaw?

What is life without the faddist?
What's the circus sans the clown?
Most amusing both when maddest,
Turning all things upside-down.

'Tis a tasteless meal you'd dish up!
Mere prescription's fare? No, thanks!
Life's dry bread may suit you, Bishop;
Let me butter it with cranks!

My contributor "Marmaduke" referred last week to the disfigurement of the church at Stewkley—a fine specimen of Norman architecture—by means of an addition which is being made to the building. I am now reminded by a correspondent that this matter has received the attention of the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings, whose report two years ago contained an account of its unsuccessful attempts to procure the abandonment of the scheme which is at present being carried out.

Some of the supporters of the Royal Portsmouth and Gosport Hospital are exceedingly wroth with the Home Secretary for his "haughty and ill-timed action" in having drawn their attention to the fact that the institution has no right to the title of "Royal." They imagine that having used the prefix for sixty years they have a prescriptive right to use it. One of them, whose indignation has bubbled over into the local press, advises Mr. Churchill to turn his attention to the numerous hotels and places of amusement which make use of the prefix without any pretence of authority. This is the veriest nonsense. The use of the prefix "Royal" in connection with a charity conveys the intimation that it receives royal patronage, and quite rightly care must be taken in the public interest that unauthorised claims to such patronage are not made. With the Royal Hotel of Mudford-on-Sea such a possibility does not present itself, and although I presume successful objection to the use of the prefix could be made in such a case no useful purpose could be served by making it.

I have received the following amounts towards this year's Toy Fund:—N.D., £2; Noel, £1; Howard Ellis, 10s.

Lieutenant-Colonel James, Royal Warwickshire Regiment, will shortly vacate the office of Military Attaché to the Embassy at Washington, which he has held since January, 1907. He is to be replaced by Major McLachlan, Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders, who has held staff appointments during the last six years in the Bahamas, at Cyprus, and in South Africa.

General Sir Charles Burnett is to vacate the command of the Western District on the 31st, when he retires from the service under the age clause. He will be succeeded at Devonport by Lieutenant-General Sir William Mackinnon, who is to be himself replaced at the War Office as Director-General of the Territorial Forces by Major-General Cowen, late in command of the Presidency Brigade at Calcutta. The latter is to be succeeded by Brigadier-General Fanshawe, who has commanded the 2nd Cavalry Brigade at Canterbury since April, 1907.

Colonel Godley, who has been in temporary command of the 7th Infantry Brigade, has been selected for the appointment of Commandant of the New Zealand forces, which he will hold for five years, the salary being £1,200 a year, which includes house allowance.

---

Colonel Repington's trenchant criticism of the marching arrangements of the 2nd Division during the recent manœuvres confirms what I said last week in my remarks on "Misdirected Manœuvres." But the Times military correspondent pounces on faults without stating their cause. Even Colonel Repington can't make bricks without straw. Faulty machinery won't work, no matter what oil is poured into it. The 2nd Division never had a chance because it was badly put together. It was not mobilised at all, but was only a collection of men, horses, guns, and wagons thrown helter skelter together and labelled "Mobilised Division." Criticism of its tactical performances under such conditions is out of place.

Next year there should be a real, not sham, test of mobilisation. This could be done if a division were brought up to war strength by calling out the Reservists who belong to it, and providing it with its own ammunition columns, field hospital, and other mobilisation accessories, which are supposed to be ready for each of the six divisions of the Expeditionary Force. No man, horse, gun, or store belonging to any other division should be used. We should then know how quickly a division could be got ready to take the field. This would not leave any money for General French's pantomime shows, or for what Colonel Gädke ironically calls "unwarlike operations"; but it would be a business way of using the money which Parliament votes the Army Council for preparing the Army for war.

Colonel Gädke describes Mr. Haldane as "the most niggardly man under the sun." The Colonel is wrong. No previous Secretary of State has ever been so generous in providing the "sinews of war." This makes it the more reprehensible that the money should have been so badly spent. The only good thing done this year, and it might have been better done, was the concentration of the Cavalry Division for Divisional Manœuvres; all else was an object-lesson in waste—waste of time, energy, money, brains, and temper.

Colonel Lonsdale Hale, ex-correspondent of the Times, is horrified at his successor's irreverent indictment of the Staff College, which in Colonel Repington's view turns out prigs and pedants instead of soldiers. Colonel Hale says that what is at fault is not the College curriculum but the use which is made of young staff officers after they have graduated, when they are placed on office stools instead of being put to practical work. I expect there is a good deal of truth in this criticism, but I could name Army Councillors and Directors who live just as much in "Cloudland" as their younger brethren at the bottom of the military ladder.

A British officer, writing from India, and anxious to pass the higher standard in Hindustani, complains of having to submit to the "indignity" of appearing before native examiners—"nasty oily baboos of the worst type," as he labels them. Most examinees think their examiners are nasty, but if I were in the place of the officer concerned, I think I should keep my thoughts to myself, and not offer gratuitous insults to native gentlemen, who are carefully selected by Government for the post of examiners, and who are only doing their duty in seeing that those who present themselves for examination are qualified for certificates. My correspondent complains of the "rudeness" of the examiners; but if he speaks to them in the same way as he writes of them I am not surprised at their retaliation.

Among other things he accuses them of being "swindlers," and of conspiring with certain Bombay Munshis, who are friends of theirs, to pass candidates who are their pupils. I do not think an officer should make such a statement under cover of anonymity without convincing evidence, and as my correspondent supplies me with none I have no intention of endorsing charges which he can only substantiate by his own suspicions. Noblesse oblige! I have heard these rumours of "swindling" for years past, but have never yet seen a particle of proof to justify them. When an officer has a real grievance I do all I can to get him redress; but I cannot act as his advocate when he treats his Indian fellow-subjects, who look to him for a lead in good breeding, with a contemptuous disregard of any sense of what is fair and straight.

Under what authority and by whose recommendation has the Government of Bombay debarred British soldiers, together with their wives and families, from being served with liquor in licensed premises? I can hardly believe that Sir George Clarke has approved of a regulation which is an insult to the uniform which he wore before his appointment to the Governorship of Bombay. Why should soldiers be treated in this pariah fashion in the Bombay Presidency and not elsewhere in India? And why soldiers and not sailors?

The regulation is oppressive as well as insulting. Take the case of Bombay. The regimental people living at Colaba have their messes and canteens, but the warrant officers and staff-sergeants of the ordnance, supply, and transport departments—some forty to fifty in number—all live two and a-half miles away in the centre of the city, where they cannot get served with a glass of beer for the asking, although their native servants can get what they like to order. The regulation is indefensible, and the Army Council should see to it that British soldiers, when serving in Bombay, have the same rights as citizens as they have in London.

Complaints reach me from India that soldiers are being detained with the colours longer than is prescribed by the Army Act. Here is a case in point. Previous to 1906 infantry soldiers who had enlisted for three years were permitted after six months' service to extend their service to eight years, after which period the Act required them to be transferred forthwith to the Army Reserve unless the country was at war. Army Order 209 of 1906 altered these conditions, infantry soldiers only being allowed to extend their service to complete seven instead of eight years with the colours, with the added proviso that if serving abroad they could be retained for a further period not exceeding one year. This proviso, which is only applicable to the case of seven-year men, is being made use of to detain eight-year men in India after they have completed the agreed period of their colour service.

This is not only a breach of faith, but a breach of law. Under Section 78 of the Army Act the Army Council may vary the conditions of service of serving soldiers with their consent, but not without it, and the Government of India have no right to detain eight-year men in the country one hour beyond the termination of their engagement unless they assent to the detention. Yet, according to my information, many men are being so detained contrary to law. The Army Council should see to this matter.

Rear-Admiral Rich has retired from the Navy, and Captain Winnington-Ingram obtains promotion to flag rank. This advancement obliges the new Rear-Admiral to vacate the command of the cruiser Argonaut at Portsmouth—a post which he had held for about a year past.

Although Rear-Admiral Sir George Warrender did not get the First Cruiser Squadron in succession to Sir Henry Jackson, as had been generally anticipated in Service circles, he has not had to wait long after relinquishing the East Indies command for a new billet. Rear-Admiral Robert Lowry will strike his flag in the Second Cruiser Squadron in November, and the King has approved of the appointment of Sir George Warrender to succeed him. This force, consisting of the Shannon, flagship, and four Warriors, is stationed at the Nore, "a suburb of London," as Naval men term it.

Captain J. R. Bridson has been selected for the command of the Fourth Division of the Home Fleet at Portsmouth. This section of the "Baltic Fleet," which winter and summer winds wearily around moorings in the sand-fringed embrace of Stokes Bay, is said to provide the very dreariest service that the Royal Navy can offer. Such impressions as I retain of the monotonous-looking group, caught whilst crossing to the Isle of Wight, certainly incline me to credit this reputation.

JEFFREY & CO.'S NEW ARTISTIC WALL PAPERS are on view at their Show Rooms, The Wallpaper Gallery, 31, Mortimer St., W. To be had of all Decorators. Factory: 64, Essex Rd., Islington, N.

"Superintendent of the Great White Herring Fishery" is a spacious title, and the naval officer who assumes it is evidently determined to do justice to its possibilities. Lerwick is a great centre for the herring fishery at this season, and to the Shetland port comes a great fleet of steam drifters, from far and near, to sweep up the sea harvest. Lieutenant Arthur Blackwood has posted a notice in Lerwick Fish Market the general purport of which is that he does not approve of the manner in which steam drifters enter and leave the harbour, and the particular point of which is summed up in the following paragraph:—"It is my direction that steam drifters are not to proceed at a greater speed than five knots when passing H.M.S. Ringdove, and are not to pass her at a distance of less than twenty-five yards."

I am not surprised that the Lerwick fishermen have torn down this notice several times. But I am surprised that the "Senior Naval Officer"—Lieutenant Blackwood thus signs himself—of a little fishery protection cruiser should persist in making himself ridiculous. Herrings are a "mushy" freight, and a boat with a hundred or so crans wants to get to market as rapidly as possible. It is not the business of the Ringdove to interfere in the navigation of Lerwick Harbour. The Lerwick Harbour Commissioners are the proper people to regulate the traffic, and if Lieutenant Blackwood does not want his ship passed at more than five knots or nearer than twenty-five yards, he has only to get out of the way.

Reference was made in Truth on July 13 to an outbreak of beri-beri on H.M.S. Proserpine, one of the ships engaged in the operations for the suppression of the arms traffic in the Persian Gulf. I now hear that H.M.S. Perseus, another of the ships doing duty in the Gulf, has been visited with a still more severe outbreak of the same horrible disease, eight sufferers being invalided home on August 8. Beri-beri appeared on board the Perseus at the beginning of June, and about the middle of the month she was ordered to Bombay for repairs and then to Colombo to recruit the health of the ship's company at the naval camp at Diyatalawa. This was in accordance with the routine of the station, which provides six weeks for this purpose for each ship. The repairs at Bombay, however, took longer than had been expected, whereupon the visit to Colombo was cancelled and the ship sent back immediately to the Gulf.

This is certainly an extraordinary proceeding, seeing that the Perseus had been employed in the Gulf since the early part of December, that she had been a prey to an epidemic of beri-beri, and that the health of her crew had been further affected by the spending of a month or so at Bombay during the worst of the monsoon. More than any other ship on the station her crew required change of air and an opportunity to recruit their health, and if an extra ship had been urgently required in the Gulf there were others which could have been much more fairly called upon. As it happened, however, an extra ship really was not wanted, the hot weather having completely stopped the operations of the gun-runners. It may be added that another case of beri-beri has occurred on board the Perseus since her return to the Gulf.

If the case of Francis Joseph Privilege be in any way typical, I can only conclude that "passing the doctor" in the Navy is a farce—with always the possibility of becoming a tragedy. This man, a Reservist stoker, volunteered for service in H.M.C.S. Niobe. He was passed by the medical officer as physically fit, and joined-up. A few nights ago he awoke his messmates by gasping in his hammock, and was removed to the sick-bay, where he expired. Surgeon H. A. Browning, of the Devonport Naval Barracks, stated at the inquest that the man died from valvular disease of the heart, accentuated by disease of the lungs and stomach, all of long standing. What sort of medical inspection can it be which finds such a man physically fit?

The success of the canteen which was experimentally established in Chatham Dockyard is such that a donation of £100 has been given to the Widow, Orphan, and Death Fund, representing all but a few pounds of the profits for the first six months. This should surely justify an imitation of Chatham's example.

The outlook of candidates for the Coastguard Service is not particularly cheery. The Admiralty have intimated that only men whose applications are dated prior to October, 1905, are to be taken on to the establishment until the whole of these have been absorbed. As only fifteen candidates per month are to be taken on, and as there are several hundred names on the waiting roster, the younger bluejackets who hope to settle down in cottage quarters by the sea will need to long possess their souls in patience.

A couple of years ago I devoted a good deal of space to the exposure of abuses connected with the issue of surcharged postage stamps by various colonial post offices. In particular I referred to certain surcharged issues in the Cayman Islands, which had manifestly been arranged for the purpose of sales to collectors, and not to meet any legitimate requirement of the local postal service. The justice of my criticisms on this scandal—strenuously denied at the time in the Colonial Office Journal—has now been recognised by Lord Crewe. In a recent despatch the authorities of the various Crown colonies and protectorates are directed to see that adequate stocks of stamps are kept in hand, so that the practice of surcharging may be avoided. Furthermore, colonial governors are reminded that it is quite outside the ordinary functions of a post office to accept from dealers standing orders for new issues, etc. This has constantly been done, but "such arrangements are calculated to lead to irregularities and complaints, and should be discontinued."

The despatch warns all postmasters, treasurers, or other financial officers of the Crown colonies that they will render themselves liable to grave censure if they are found dealing in postage stamps for purposes of private profit. It is quite certain that in the past colonial postal officials, especially in small and remote places, have frequently been engaged in transactions of this kind, and it was high time that such an improper business was stopped.

For some time past the Ruthin Board of Guardians has been shillyshallying over the necessity of providing additional workhouse accommodation. They have spent months in discussing schemes without any result. Now the Local Government Board has sent them rough plans for the necessary extension with an intimation that they are at once to proceed with the execution of the work. The Ruthin Bumbles must be very simple folk if they imagine that the requirements of the Local Government Board are to be satisfied with mere interminable discussions.

The St. Anne's-on-the-Sea Borough Council some years ago thought it desirable to give greater publicity to its municipal affairs than they were receiving, and the local newspapers were invited to send reporters to the Council committee meetings. Last week the councillors reversed the decision. They have been getting too much publicity. The press men grew tired of licking their speeches into shape, and the public took kindly to the novelty of reading exactly what their elected representatives did say. Finally, a threat to report the proceedings verbatim et literatim was too much for the St. Anne's councillors, and they banished the press. It is exceedingly unkind of them to keep their oratorical gems for purely private consumption.

THE FIRST FIRE.

I speak not of the flame that tries
  One's lares, and endurance,
That, mounting to the reddening skies,
Destroys your all, which, if you're wise,
  Is covered by insurance:

Not of that heavenly spark of fire
  The Titan termed Prometheus,
Filched from Olympus' hoary sire
(And thereby gained his righteous ire)
  For what I'd call "Beneath" use:

Not that peculiar fire that first
  Enflames a bardic body
And bids him into poems burst,
Nor that strange flame I count accurst
  That comes of taking toddy:

Nor yet that primal fire that forms
  In breasts some stamp as stupid
Which some angelic beauty warms,
When love's bacilli come in swarms,
  Urged on by little Cupid:—

I speak of that right ruddy glow
  That men, by nature sober,
Feel when they toast each tepid toe—
The fire inside the grate, you know,
  Lit first in bleak October.

The first fruits of the Royal Commission on the Selection of Justices of the Peace has been the appointment by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster of an advisory committee for the County Palatine. The duties of the committee are not to recommend new candidates for the Bench, but to report on the adequacy of the present arrangements and the desirability of calling upon justices in certain cases to resign. Thus the business of weeding out the magistrates who have sought for the dignity without any intention of performing the duties of the magistracy is to take precedence of new appointments. As regards new appointments, these are to be made as heretofore by the Lord Lieutenant, the only difference being that the Lord Lieutenant will refuse to receive any unasked-for recommendations from members of Parliament or political agents. Whether the new arrangement is likely to broaden the basis of representation on the Bench or make the magistracy still more closely representative of the classes which have chiefly provided the Shallows of the past remains to be seen. It all depends upon the Lord Lieutenant.

One of the side-issues which the departmental committee appointed to inquire into the law relating to coroners' courts was called upon to investigate was the danger of wearing flannelette. The committee has now issued its report. It has come to the conclusion that "a woman or child whose skirt or dressing-gown of flannelette comes into contact with fire must, unless prompt measures are taken, suffer serious injury, and is not unlikely to be burned to death." It hardly needed a departmental committee to discover a fact so obvious. Nor need it have been invoked to discover that in October, November, and January last the deaths from burning in which flannelette played a part numbered 176. Where it might have performed a useful function would have been in suggesting some means whereby such appalling mortality might be prevented. But on this point the committee is dumb, beyond advising that a little alum or borax should be added to the water in which the material is washed. It puts aside any idea of legislation on the subject on the ground that it would be unfair. Unfair to the manufacturers of the fabric, I presume, certainly not to the six or seven hundred victims who are sacrificed every year.

It has been said that wooden legs "run in the blood;" and in certain families the same thing seems to be true of judges' wigs. Mr. Montague Lush is the latest example of this form of heredity. The head is no doubt hereditary as well as the wig. Mr. Lush has not been one of those barristers whose names figure conspicuously in newspaper causes célèbres, but he has enjoyed a large practice both as a junior and a "silk." He is a thoroughly sound lawyer, and having in addition an equable temper and a pleasant manner he will be a decided acquisition to the Bench. Lord Loreburn has been very happy in his judicial appointments.

Sir Harry Poland has made a timely protest against the hardship which is inflicted on witnesses by the duplication of the preliminary inquiries into cases of murder or manslaughter. They are examined and cross-examined before the magistrate and before the coroner; next, if their evidence is important, they have to appear before the grand jury; and finally they are examined and cross-examined once more before the judge and jury. In a multitude of cases the inquiry in the coroner's court is extremely useful. Not only may it bring to light crimes which would otherwise be undetected, but frequently it serves to call attention to matters which, although affording no ground for a criminal charge, nevertheless need exposure in the public interest with a view to the adoption of remedial or preventive measures. When, however, a person accused of murder or manslaughter is already in custody, proceedings before the coroner as well as before the magistrate are absolutely unnecessary, serving no purpose whatever beyond the mischievous one of giving the newspapers a double supply of sensational "copy."

The appearance of a couple of diminutive boys of thirteen at the London County Sessions last week on a charge of theft led to an indignant protest on the part of the jury and their immediate liberation by Mr. Wallace. It is only fair to say that the fathers of the children were directly responsible for their appearance, but indirectly the harshness shown by some of the metropolitan magistrates to juvenile offenders appears to have been responsible. "You see, sir," explained one of the fathers, "the magistrate at Tower Bridge seems spiteful against us and our little children, so we thought we'd have the case settled by a jury." From the explanation since given by Mr. Rose it would seem that the man who thus impugned the quality of the justice dispensed at Tower Bridge was artfully making use of the recent agitation on behalf of young offenders. If undue harshness had never been exhibited his plea would never have received credence.

It is not, however, London magistrates alone who have failed to take a rational view of the treatment of young offenders. Last week two boys, one of sixteen years of age named Larkins, the other a child of eleven, were brought up on remand before the Lincoln City Bench charged with stealing two boxes of chocolate from a shop. Since the first hearing of the case they had both been again arrested for breaking into another shop. This certainly looked like depravity, but that there is an alternative point of view may be gathered from the fact that Larkins's father explained that his boy had said he would do something desperate unless he was allowed to go on a training ship. The magistrates put the younger lad under the charge of the probation officer, but sent the lad of sixteen to gaol for three months. Larkins merely wanted to be a sailor, but the Lincoln magistrates of their wisdom have decided that he shall be a criminal. It is not too late for the Home Secretary to save him from that fate.

A remarkable case heard at the Shoreditch County Court last week was a revelation of the seamy side of the shoddy jewellery trade. The action was brought by a veneer merchant to recover from Messrs. Sims and Mayer, of Bedford Street, Strand, £17 3s. 3d. which had been paid them by a schoolgirl of thirteen. The defendants were in the habit of advertising in novelettes agreeing to supply "ring clubs" amongst schoolgirls who paid in a penny a week, and balloted amongst themselves for possession of a shilling ring. The girl saw the advertisement and got into communication with the advertisers. She was dazzled with the catalogue of mock jewellery sent her, and in order to obtain possession of some of it she stole blank signed cheques left in her father's charge by his employer, filled them up with the necessary sums, and paid them to Sims and Mayer in return for large parcels of the sham jewellery. The judge, in view of the importance of transactions by cheque, reserved his decision as to whether the money thus paid was recoverable, but whatever his decision there is room for no two opinions as to the conduct of a firm which takes comparatively large sums from little schoolgirls for sham jewellery without making any inquiry as to how they come by the money.

At an inquest held at Westminster last week on a woman named Maitland, who drowned herself in the Thames, it was stated that she had been driven to desperation by her treatment at the hands of a furnishing company. According to witnesses she had purchased £19 10s. worth of furniture on a hire purchase agreement. She had paid £17 and was in arrears for the balance. The company sent four men to remove the furniture. She offered them £1, but they demanded 25s., and as she could not pay that sum they removed the whole of the furniture, leaving her on the bare boards for four nights. Curiously enough, not one of the reports of the case I have seen mentions the name of the company, though it must be obvious that too much publicity cannot be given to a company which treats its customers in this fashion. Reputable firms should not be allowed to suffer by tactics calculated to bring discredit upon the whole of the hire-purchase system of business.

A kindly practice of the colonies was revealed in the case of Matthew Hamil, charged at the London County Sessions with damaging two plate-glass windows at Westminster. It was the first time Hamil had been in trouble in this country, but five convictions had been recorded against him in South Africa, whence he had been deported as an undesirable. In other words, the colony takes an honest man, turns him into a criminal, and sends the finished product back to the old country. This is a form of dumping of manufactured goods against which we may legitimately ask for protection.

The hero of the amazing attempt to impose martial law on the inhabitants of Winterbourne Stoke to which reference was made in Truth last week seems to be rather fond of taking the law into his own hands. He is a Captain Benett-Stanford, and he appeared last week as witness on behalf of the R.S.P.C.A. at the prosecution of a man for ill-treating a cow. From the evidence it appeared that, catching the man in the act of thrashing the animal, the gallant captain offered him the alternative of "a hiding" or a summons. The man expressed the intention of taking the hiding if the captain could give him one. No doubt having learned from the recent manœuvres the value of superior forces in dealing with an adversary, the captain went away and returned with two sticks, two men, and a piece of rope, expressing the intention of tying the man up and giving him twenty-four strokes. The cow-beater thereupon elected to receive the summons. He was wise, for the magistrates dismissed the case, though I really do not see why because Captain Benett-Stanford allowed his zeal to outrun his discretion the cow-beater should have been allowed to escape all punishment.

As I anticipated, no sort of onus for the cruelty practised upon the eleven-year-old girl, the victim in the Ilfracombe cruelty case, rested with the Waifs and Strays Society. The child was not one of those boarded out by the Society, and over whom a very efficient system of supervision is exercised, but a child adopted on the application of a well-known ecclesiastic of Ilfracombe, whose successor, on the original applicant's death, had promised to look after the girl's welfare. This gentleman had to go abroad for his health, and thus the girl was left to the mercy of her adoptive mother. In a letter, however, the Secretary of the Society recognises so strongly the danger of allowing children to be adopted that he promises to do his best to induce the committee not to listen to applications for adoption in the future.

During the hearing of an action against C. H. Stevens, the notorious consumption quack (No. 175 Truth Cautionary List), at Basingstoke at the end of July last, Stevens stated that he could name many fully qualified medical men under whom he had studied. Under cross-examination he only gave the name of one —Dr. Stewart, of Somerset Hospital, Cape Town—and he defined the nature of his study by explaining that it consisted of giving his remedy to patients and getting medical men to watch the cases. This statement has been brought by the South African Review to the notice of Dr. Stewart, who has promptly characterised it as wholly without foundation, so far as he was concerned. After all, Stevens need not have gone so far as South Africa for the name of doctors who had tried his nostrum on their patients, but I presume that he thought that if he gave the name of a South African medical man he would be secure from any exposure as to the results of his medical study.

The action in question was a particularly interesting one for other reasons. It turned upon Stevens's offer to present £10 to every person he undertook to cure if he failed to do so. The plaintiff's husband was suffering from consumption, and he was induced to try Stevens's remedy. He died, according to the death certificate, of "pulmonary tuberculosis," and the widow sued Stevens for the £10. The case was tried before Judge Gye, who gave judgment, after an exhaustive summing-up, for the sum claimed. Stevens made an application for leave to appeal, whereupon his Honour remarked that he regarded the offer as an "intentional and well-considered fraud"; that he regarded it as "scandalous that poor people should be imposed upon and led to part with their money in the confident hope that they or their relations would be cured"; and that it was "perfectly obvious" that Stevens's cure "was nothing but a quack advertising remedy which was really no remedy of any sort or kind." This very accurately sums up the gist of what has appeared in Truth at one time or another regarding Stevens and his cure.

The Albion Magazine for the deaf always contains some interesting information regarding the personality of the deaf quacks, and the current number is no exception to the rule. One item of interest is its identification of "Dr." Crippen with M. Franckel, who pushed the sale of "Ohrsorb" (No. 163 Truth Cautionary List), a remedy for deafness in regard to which a well-known analyst expressed the opinion that it was nothing more than scented vaseline. Of still more interest is the suggestion made in the magazine that Marr, alias Keith-Harvey, is behind the business of Erasmus Colman, the catarrh specialist, of Gray's Inn Road. The association of Crippen with Marr's latest deaf enterprise, the "Aural Remedies Company," ought to be quite sufficient to cause the company to shut up shop, even if it does not lead Marr to contemplate the advisability of getting out of the quack-medicine business altogether.

A country rector sends me the copy of a diary which he has received from Gant, of Conduit Street, accompanied by a letter offering to place his name upon Gant's list of clients. Mr. Gant probably sees no harm in soliciting a clergyman to indulge in a little flutter on the turf, but I can assure him that one at least of the recipients of his favours looks upon the offer as an insult, and asks me to protect him against its repetition. All that I can do is to suggest to Mr. Gant that he is not likely to add many desirable clients to his list by circularising the clergy. The clergyman who can so compromise with his conscience as to open an account with a starting price bookmaker is, I should imagine, likely to find his conscience become exceedingly active when he is asked to pay his losses.

A betting circular, "investment form," etc., directed to "the coachman" at a country house by a bookmaker named E. H. Brewer, of Kingscourt, Queen Anne's Gate, has been handed to me by the coachman's employer. The latter thinks it scandalous that servants should be thus incited to squander their wages in gambling, possibly getting into even worse mischief than that. I agree. Brewer audaciously gives as references "any professional racing man;" but it is certain that no respectable Turfite would countenance this method of touting.

Harry Rouse, Turf Accountant, Flushing, asserts in his latest circular that he is the proprietor of large engineering works at Aylestone, "representing assets amounting to £125,000, being magnificent security for clients." He also states that his watchword is reliability. This makes it of interest to note that a few days before the issue of this circular H. C. Russell (trading as Harry Rouse) and Lucien Stokvis (alias Joe Drake) were committed for trial by the Lutterworth J.P.s on a charge of conspiring to defraud bookmakers.

Two letters from a racing tipster named George Gordon, Rutland Chambers, Newmarket, have been passed on to me. In the first he advised the addressee—a gentleman who had never had any communication with him or even heard of his existence—to back a certain horse for a good win, adding: "Kindly put me on the odds to £1." No notice was taken of this gratuitous tip, but though the horse was beaten, Gordon was not in any way abashed. At the end of ten days he wrote again, and this time he coolly asked for £2 "for the week's winners!" Strange as it may seem, however, such harpies as Gordon get lots of money from greenhorns in this way.

The reference in Truth last week to Mr. Ashley Larkin's little dodge for advertising his latest book has brought me communications from a number of people who have been invited to show their qualifications for entering Mr. Ashley Larkin's employment by sending him a review of "England's Government of Her Dependencies." It has also brought me a couple of abusive letters from Mr. Ashley Larkin himself, in one of which he announces his intention of prosecuting me "for aiding and abetting false pretences." Precisely what he means by this I cannot understand, and I do not suppose that he does himself. In fact, from the general tenor of his letters it is only charitable to suppose that on occasions he is not quite responsible for his actions. There is sufficient method in his megalomania, however, to warrant me in continuing to warn the public against him.

In consequence of my paragraph a few weeks ago respecting the lottery business of a concern styled the Northern Credit Bank, Limited, Copenhagen, a Danish resident in London communicated with the Danish Press. It now appears that the so-called "bank" is not running a lottery on its own account, nor has it anything whatever to do with the Danish State Lottery; but, in common with several similar firms which have sprung up in Copenhagen during the last year, it is using that city as a centre for a traffic in the tickets of various minor German and Austrian State lotteries. The Danish Minister for Justice has now decided to put an end to this business by means of criminal proceedings against the firms in question.

Just as I am going to press I have received a letter from Messrs. Ruyter, Van Eijk, Mowbray and Company, of Utrecht, in reference to a paragraph which appeared in last week's Truth. The letter calls my attention to an article from an Amsterdam newspaper, but I shall have to obtain a translation before I can deal with it, and I must therefore defer further remarks on the matter till next week.

A GAME OF SOMERSAULTS.

What does it mean? What does it mean?
'Tis the queerest somersault ever was seen.
Smith and his Tory friends are bent
On paying Members of Parliament.

Head over heels! Head over heels!
What is the object this move conceals?
They loathed the thing from their very soul,
And now they're eager to swallow it whole.

What does it mean? What does it mean?
'Tis the queerest somersault ever was seen
Red Labs. decided, I understand,
The "Pledge" to abolish out of hand

Head over heels! Head over heels!
What is the object this move conceals?
The "Pledge" they loved. By the "Pledge" they swore,
And now they have thrown their darling o'er.

Turn-turn-coats! Turn-turn-coats!
Can it be that they're out for votes,
When Tory blues and Labour reds
Both elect to stand on their heads?

All serene. All serene.
Nothing unusual here is seen
Those who've an eye for jumping cats
Were always political acrobats.

SCRUTATOR.

THE ARMY COUNCIL AND THE SUTOR CASE.

THE court martial on Lieutenant Sutor, and its sequel in the reduction of the sentence of summary dismissal to one of formal reprimand, is a testimony to Mr. Haldane's sense of justice, and at the same time a slap in the face to the Army Council. A less resolute Minister than the present War Secretary would never have broken away from the traditional Army practice which was put before him by his military advisers as necessary for the enforcement of discipline, but which he rejected as judicially indefensible. Had Mr. Haldane chosen to do so he would have been legally empowered to recommend the Crown to dismiss Lieutenant Sutor without giving him a chance of justifying the breach of the King's Regulations which he unquestionably committed; but in place of doing this he decided to bring the offending officer to trial, and so enable him to submit his conduct to public criticism.

What are the facts of Lieutenant Sutor's case? Joining the Army in 1901, when the war fever was at its height, he was given a commission, without examination, on his merits as a civilian. He had received a legal education, and had been a schoolmaster, but was attracted to the Army by the hope of gaining distinction and finding in the Service an outlet for his undoubted ability. The life disappointed him from the first, being without scope and without interest. His work normally occupied him for only half an hour a day, and he found it dull and mechanical in its nature. Yet for nine years he performed such duties as came in his way with a precision which was testified to by his commanding officer, and with commendable self-control, for he succeeded in concealing his cynical contempt for military life from those with whom he worked. At last he saw a chance of rising out of the ruck, his commanding officer having recommended him for the post of adjutant of the Durham Artillery. He was accordingly sent to the signalling school at Aldershot to obtain the certificate which was required by the Regulations before he could take up his new duties. While going through the signalling course he more than suspected some hanky-panky amounting to "cribbing" on the part of some of the officers, and in order to elucidate matters he sounded the sergeant-major as to whether it was possible for officers to see the questions before the examination took place. Misapprehending the purpose of his inquiry, the sergeant-major reported the conversation to the commandant, who sent for Lieutenant Sutor, and demanded that he should give up the names of the suspected officers. Lieutenant Sutor refused to do so, and was summarily dismissed from the school, the suggestion being that his conversation with the sergeant-major was attempted bribery. After receiving the commandant's report the Army Council ordered a court of inquiry, before which Lieutenant Sutor appeared. The report of the court cleared the school from any irregularities, but made no direct reference to the charge against Lieutenant Sutor, who, however, was informed by the Army Council that his adjutant's appointment was cancelled. In order to clear his character Lieutenant Sutor wrote the pamphlet for which he was brought to trial.

I know no more about Lieutenant Sutor than about the man in the moon, but his case, as stated above, has a public interest which cannot be ignored. There are many sides to the case as revealed by the court-martial, but for the moment I intend to confine my remarks to the signalling school episode, which is the crux of the whole business, and which the lieutenant pleaded as his justification for breaking the letter of the regulations. In order to clear up matters I am going to put the Army Council into the witness-box, and ask some straightforward questions which, however, are not likely to be answered unless replies are wrung out of Mr. Haldane by Parliamentary cross-examination. Lieutenant Sutor left the signalling school under an admitted cloud, but the court of inquiry must have exonerated him from the charge of attempted bribery, otherwise, with or without trial, he would have been rightly drummed out of the Army. My first question to the Army Council is: Why was Lieutenant Sutor not informed of this exoneration instead of being left to continue to serve with the imputation of dishonour clinging to his name? After the report of the court of inquiry had been received by the War Office the Army Council decided to deprive Lieutenant Sutor of his adjutancy, ostensibly because he had failed to get his signalling certificate; but his failure to obtain the necessary certificate was not due to inability to do so, but to his expulsion from the school before the examination for certificates took place. My second question, then, to the Army Council is: Why was Lieutenant Sutor not sent back to the school from which he had been unjustly expelled on a charge which the Army Council knew to be baseless? And my third question is: Why were the proceedings of the court of inquiry withheld from the court-martial? I can only suppose with others that the Council feared to incriminate themselves by the production of evidence which, if published in open court, would have convicted them of hushing up a scandal by making a scapegoat of a young officer who but for his courage in breaking the regulations would have remained a marked man among his comrades, a pariah and outcast from their company, with doubts both as to his honesty and sanity. In the interests of justice the proceedings of the court of inquiry ought to be published in order that the public may know whether others besides Lieutenant Sutor should be put in the dock and be required to clear themselves from suspicion.

As to the pamphlet which Lieutenant Sutor wrote, beyond the chapter narrating the episode at the signalling school, it contains nothing of any value and nothing which has not been said before and said much better. Unlike the Navy, which is always ready for war, the Army lives during peace in a state of perpetual unpreparedness. Peace traditions outlive war lessons, which, as the late manœuvres show, are speedily forgotten when danger is over. This must always be the case when a country depends for security not upon its Army but upon its sea power. All this we knew before Lieutenant Sutor wrote his pamphlet; but if we cannot have efficiency we have a right to demand honesty, and require those who govern the Army to be men of straight conduct. Yet when I see and hear what is going on, and to what depths Army Councillors will descend in order to keep their places and draw their salaries, I begin to doubt whether the country should allow them to continue in office with no other check on their conduct than that of the political head of the Army, who is not a soldier and cannot always successfully cope with the Jesuitical chicanery of his military advisers.

THE CENSOR AGAIN.

In one of Sir W. S. Gilbert's best-known operas there are two lines which run "He shall prick that annual blister, Marriage with deceased wife's sister." Well, that blister has been pricked, but it is surely time now that something was done with that other hardy annual, the Censorship question. We have had committees, reports, and discussions, but the old evil still remains, and the trouble has blazed out once more with Mr. Redford's action over Mr. Laurence Housman's play, "Pains and Penalties." I have not read the play, but it seems that it contains references to George IV. which the Censor of our stage morals thinks undesirable, not so much, I gather, because the references themselves are undesirable as because no references at all should be allowed. I confess I am inclined to agree with Mr. Housman that the Censorship is ridiculous, inconsistent, and offensive. Mr. Hall Caine may write plays in which foreign statesmen, thinly disguised, figure, in which the Pope is made absurd, or in which the Divinity is invoked with appalling freedom; but the personality of the great and good George IV. is too sacred to be touched upon. Surely it is time we realised that the Censorship is an absolute anachronism, and that it has no justification whatever in these days. I say no justification, but I should perhaps, qualify this by saying that the only excuse for public regulation of the theatres is that as a theatre implies a considerable concourse of people it is necessary from the public point of view to provide against possible rows and disorder, but I can hardly fancy details about or references to George IV. exciting a tumult. It has been solemnly maintained that Mr. Housman and certain of our advanced dramatists write plays with a view to their being censored in order to gain notoriety. I do not envy the state of mind of people who can seriously advance such an argument. Playwrights write plays either for commercial reasons or because they feel, like Mr. Bernard Shaw, that they have a message they wish to deliver to the age. In either case if the play is censored their object is defeated. They neither make money nor make a wide appeal to the public. So many months' work is practically wasted. Leaving this fantastic idea though, I am bound to admit that after having read innumerable arguments for and against the whole question, I am convinced that we should be better off without any restrictions or censorship at all, except such as managers in their own interests would exercise. Managers undoubtedly find the Censorship convenient, because it relieves them of a certain responsibility. To me it would be far better, though, that they should have the responsibility and exercise it. I would trust them, considering the conditions of their licences, not to produce plays which were offensive to our reigning House.

As a matter of plain common sense, why should there be a moral censorship for plays when there is none for art or literature? Novelists no less than historians deal with all aspects of history, ancient and modern, and when you come to sex problems they are the stock-in-trade of novelists, and heaven knows they handle them freely enough. Indeed, so freely have they done it of late that the police have intervened; but the police could intervene at a theatre if a manager chose to pander to the lowest tastes of the public as certain publishers have done. It is a little absurd to suggest that any more moral harm is done by the performance of a play in public than by the reading of a novel in private. On the contrary, it seems to me that the novel is a much more insidious evil, because it can be read in secret, and we all know that many women delight in reading the worst kind of novels, which they hide from their friends. Similarly, the worst drunkard is the man who "soaks" at home, not the convivial companion; while people cannot go to a play without the fact being known to their friends. They have to take their gratification in public, and they must openly participate in indecency or disloyalty. It is very much the same with pictures. Many pictures have been exhibited in London—not to say Paris—which are far more indecent than any play which the Censor has vetoed, and the demoralising effect of indecent pictures is very little less than that of a similar exhibition on the stage.

I remember that Mr. Granville Barker complained that the Censorship checked dramatists in the choice of subjects. This is undoubtedly true, and a matter much to be deplored at a time when a number of young dramatists are trying to get away from stage conventions and give us real life. The reason for this is that the Censor in practice does not seem to consider the question of morality so much as the question of decency, and this he looks at merely from the point of view of Mrs. Grundy. The result is that really intellectual plays with no immoral tendency in them at all are forbidden because they are considered "shocking" from the point of view of the mistress of a young ladies' seminary, while all sorts of veiled indecencies and gross innuendoes are tolerated. I have made a careful study of censored plays, and have never found anything in them one quarter as nauseating or offensive as things that I have seen and heard on the stage. I shall hope in time to read Mr. Housman's play, and I am hoping, too, that it will prove another nail in the coffin of the Censorship.

BUCKET SHOPS AS GAMING HOUSES.

In an article last week I referred to the need of a vigorous enforcement of the criminal law for the suppression of the bucket-shop frauds now practised so extensively at the cost of inexperienced investors. Incidentally I drew a distinction between the bucket-shop keepers who are downright swindlers and those who, though they take advantage of the gullibility of the public, are guiltless of any fraud in the restricted criminal sense of the term. Probably the latter cause even more mischief than the former, and it may be interesting to consider whether an end cannot be put to their operations. They carry on a system of gambling in connection with stocks and shares which—as I will show presently—differs essentially in the eye of the law from legitimate speculation on the Stock Exchange. I am not myself an out-and-out anti-gambler—far from it—but at the same time I recognise that for the average man or woman gambling is very often a road, if not to ruin, at least to losses which they can ill afford. My objection to the bucket shop is that it not only entices on to this road many people who otherwise would never traverse it, but as a rule wins money from them by devices which in point of honesty are really no better than those of the thimble-rigger or the card-sharper. The victims are, of course, completely ignorant of everything relating to the stock markets, or they would not swallow the absurd fairy tales with which they are regaled in newspaper advertisements, in circulars, and, above all, in those wonderful guides to "money-making," "scientific speculation," etc., which are offered to all and sundry free, gratis, and for nothing.

All this literature is cunningly designed to persuade the unwary that they can make big profits with a very small capital if they will only employ the capital in deals with the bucket shop on the cover system. Sometimes the system is euphemistically described as one of "marginal investment." The customer hands over a certain sum—many of the bucket shops will accept anything from £2 upwards—as "cover," or "margin," or "deposit," or whatever it may be called, on a supposed purchase of shares which he is assured are about to rise. In the vast majority of cases the shares recommended are American Rails, and the cover is 1 per cent., while the transactions are always governed by what are known as the tape quotations. How this works out has often been explained by my City Editor, but it will be sufficient to say here that generally speaking it is about a hundred to one chance that the 1 per cent. cover will run off—at least half of it usually disappears automatically owing to the wide difference between the buying and selling prices—almost immediately, whereupon the bucket-shop keeper will regretfully inform his dupe that in consequence of a quite unexpected set-back his money is lost. His money is, of course, in the pocket of the bucket-shop keeper. As often as not, however, the dupe does not even then perceive how he has been fooled. He has been furnished with "sold" and "bought" contract notes, etc., and in his innocence he imagines that the bucket-shop keeper has actually been dealing in shares on his account. He does not understand that the whole transaction is a pure pretence, a mere matter of book-keeping entries, on the part of the bucket-shop keeper. The latter's position is simply that of a bookmaker who is accepting bets on the rise or fall of share quotations. In one respect he certainly has a big advantage over the Turf bookmaker. The most verdant backer in the racing world would hardly be so silly as to take his tips from the bookmaker, who stands to gain what he loses. This, however, is the procedure of a multitude of the simpletons who gamble with the bucket shops.

It is obvious that in fact if not in law the bucket shops are just as much gaming houses as any in which betting on horse races is illegally carried on. Broadly speaking, it is a criminal offence to conduct a ready-money betting business anywhere else than on a racecourse. The bookmaker who runs a starting-price office must deal with his customers on the credit system. The moment he begins to take cash for bets in advance of the events on which the bets are made his office becomes a gaming house, and he is liable to heavy penalties. Now, practically the whole of the bucket-shop betting is done on the ready-money plan, the customers being required to send their cash with their "orders." Why not, then, suppress these establishments as common gaming houses? In an action between rival bucket-shop keepers which came before the Vice-Chancellor of the Lancashire Chancery Court some time ago it was contended that the business in dispute was illegal, being contrary to both the Gaming Act and the Betting Act. The learned Vice-Chancellor endorsed this view, describing bucket-shop cover gambles as nothing else than ready-money betting, and expressing the opinion that proceedings should be taken to put a stop to businesses which were doing an incalculable amount of mischief. It may be that, after all, such proceedings could not be successfully launched against the bucket shops in the existing state of the law, but if so, little difficulty would be experienced in procuring the necessary amendment of the law. No doubt I shall be told that this would put an end to Stock Exchange speculation, and it may therefore be desirable to point out that that objection is already answered by various decisions of the Courts. In case after case the judges have drawn a distinction between speculative transactions on the Stock Exchange and gambles for differences with outside brokers, the fundamental points being that the Stock Exchange broker is an agent who on behalf of his principal makes bargains with dealers for the purchase or sale of stock, whereas the outside broker is nearly always acting as a principal himself. A Stock Exchange broker could not successfully plead the Gaming Act in repudiation of any ordinary Stock Exchange contract. The bucket-shop keeper can almost invariably do so, and that is indeed a common practice of the shadier members of the fraternity.

There may be some people who hold that the bucket-shop keepers should be left free to prey upon anybody foolish enough to fall into their traps. My article a week ago brought me the following letter, signed "Barrister-at-Law":—

> No doubt you will think I have a depraved mind, but I confess I cannot agree with the above article in your issue to-day. Why should you or I, as tax and rate payers, who have sense enough to leave bucket-shop keepers alone, pay for the prosecution of such men? A murderer may murder you or me, a burglar may burgle your house or mine; it is, therefore, to our interest that such people should be prosecuted at the public expense, but I cannot see this as to offences which, speaking generally, need for their commission the participating credulity or cupidity or folly of other people. Let the bitten fools pay for the prosecution and not the public. Of course, a prosecution costs money, but there is no reason why, in London, the example of the provinces, with their many associations for the prosecution of felons, should not be followed. A bucket-shop prosecution costs money, the issue is always doubtful, and the advantage dubious.

This gentleman, who is politically a Conservative, seems to be socially something of an anarchist. No doubt the victim of the cover-snatcher is often a person who ought to have known better, but, on the other hand, there are a great many cases in which his or her ignorance of all stock-dealing transactions, to say nothing of the ways of City sharks, is by no means inexcusable. As a rule the victims are comparatively poor people, and for my own part as a tax and rate payer I am quite willing to bear my share of the very trifling expenditure required to bring to justice the harpies who rob and cheat them. After all, credulity is not a crime, but swindling is. In many directions it is recognised as the duty of the police and magistrates to protect fools from rogues, and I do not see why this duty should be shirked in the case of the folly and the roguery associated with bucket-shop frauds. Nor do I see why the law, which punishes the turf bookmaker for ready-money betting, should ignore the ready-money betting carried on by the bucket-shop keeper. The fact that the latter system of gambling is disguised so artfully that many people are ensnared without perceiving its true character makes it all the more harmful to the community, and in view of the extent to which the evil has spread in the past two or three years it is high time that steps were taken to deal with it.

THE RECORDING ANGEL.

In the law courts of this world there is a growing assumption of the spirit of pardon which has hitherto been regarded as the prerogative of the next, and juries in an increasing degree attempt to exercise the leniency of the Recording Angel. Thus we have the increasing talk of unwritten laws; we get the formation of codes of honour which render not only excusable but necessary the commission of perjury by co-respondents in defended divorce cases, and we have created the sentiment of pardon for the crime passionnel.

All these mental exaltations are but the recognition of some thing—vague and indefinite—which is more understanding than the law. They are an appeal to a tribunal which is above the law, and which is more considerate in its judgments.

Neglecting the scriptural precision of the picture of the Recording Angel as a Celestial accountant we may form of him a shadowy human idea. He may be Brown, who, purple in the face from the window of his club, points out a passer by as a scoundrel. It may be Mrs. X, who records the judgment of our world based on the thrice-told tale of servants. It appears appalling to suggest that public opinion is the real recording Angel. Yet assuredly it is. And more and more as time rolls by do the functions of public opinion resemble those of the moral bookkeeper in Heaven, and more and more frequently do the sinners amongst us obtain from the world at large the revision if not the reversion of the decision of the Courts.

One would like to think that the increased leniency of the Recording Angel were due to the softening influence of education, the ethical force of right. Alas! it is more probable that the cause is only to be found in the increased facilities for error afforded by such things as the Stock Exchange and Rubber Booms, and the increased necessity for it imposed by over-taxation and a disregard for the theories of Mr. Malthus. There is nowadays no absolute standard of right—no moral yard measure; it may be doubted whether there ever has been one since Adam transgressed the only law there was to break. Men were burnt in days gone by for opinions and acts which now are only visited by the lesser penalties of some Royal Society's gold medal and a number of indifferent public dinners. Not so long ago the contemporary shop-lifter was hanged; now he gets seven days or is discharged—a change surely not due to any modern depreciation in the estimate of property, but to the wider appreciation of the necessity some persons are under to acquire it.

There is in erring humanity brought finally to book at the Old Bailey or elsewhere not at all infrequently the feeling that the world outside would not be so harsh, so uncompromising in its judgments. There is nearly always resentment at the incapacity of juries and judges to take into account those circumstances of extenuation which, to the sinner, are never absent. There is the question of chance. If you ask an honest lower class criminal how it comes that he has broken the law, the reply is that "'e never 'ad no chance." The rich wrongdoer, from the co-respondent to the company promoter, finds his extenuation in the fact that he had too many. Each is in his heart convinced of the blindness of Justice when he falls beneath her sword; each feels in his soul the certainty that the Recording Angel who understands all will forgive all and refrain from making a black entry in his case. One has a feeling that the idea contained in "Tout comprendre c'est tout pardonner" was first applied by Adam as salve to his uneasy terror when discovered in a state of nudity by his Maker. Assuredly it crystallises the invincible faith of the law-breaker in the understanding, and in the consequent inevitability of pardon at the hands of the Recording Angel, who acts largely with the discretion of a magistrate in committing or not committing for trial.

More horrific even than the femme incomprise would be the transgressor were his certainty shaken that "somewhere the sun am shining" and his faith in ultimate comprehension, even if only by himself, destroyed. A Chinese tramp philosopher, freely translated, has consolation to offer even to the misunderstood. He wrote: "The Celestial Records are so adorned with the pearls of compassion that in the absence of heavenly blotting paper they are become illegible through smudging."

NOTES FROM PARIS.

I WONDER whether the Prime Minister of any other great country except France would have been prompted by his fine sensibility to appear, as did M. Briand, at his mother's funeral? The only woman who wore a bonnet in the long feminine following was his sister. The others included near and far relations, friends, cronies of the deceased, who wore white coifs bound round with black ribbon and the traditional gown and cashmere shawl or black neckerchief. Their hands were generally too hardened by toil to be at ease in gloves, and so they remained bare. The men nearest to the Minister were homespun Bretons, bargees, dockers, small farmers, and water bailiffs from the rivers where he fishes in his holidays. The bigwigs of Nantes and of the official world were farther back. Yet telegrams of condolence from many of the European Monarchs and from all the Governments of Europe awaited M. Briand at the Ministry of the Interior. Fine sensibility is at the root of good taste, and this Minister afforded an example The funeral would have been extremely humble but for the luxury of wreaths that came from Cabinet colleagues and heads of sections at the Ministry of the Interior, members of the Chamber, and the Prefect and sub-Prefects of the Loire Inférieure. A former official of the Lower Loire tells me that "Mme. Briand mère impressed one as being somebody, though she never, perhaps, in her life spent a sou in a milliner's shop, and wore in going to Mass a white coif, collar, and black silk apron. In bad weather she went about in sabots. The only difference her son's great rise in the world made in her attire was in the quality of the lace and muslin in her coif and the addition of black mittens. She resembled her son, and especially in the eyes, which could be of melting softness or extremely piercing. As an innkeeper she must have often with her glance turned inside out the conscience of a wayfarer wanting to conceal his thoughts. At the Pipards' Club they explained in some degree the veer-round of Briand towards apaisement by the old lady's anxiety for his soul, and her prayers that he should bury the hatchet which he had been using against the Church. No doubt he promised with the mental reservation of 'If the Church lets me.' He was a tenderly loving and devoted son. This the Prefectorial authorities well knew, and those of the Sub-Prefecture of Ancenis spared no petits soins to oblige her."

The funeral of Mme. Pasteur was on another footing. Pasteur died ranking as a Prince of Science, a Member of the Academy of Sciences and of the French Academy, a gold medallist of every scientific body of eminence in the world. Their descendants enjoy highly honourable positions, as worldlings judge of such things. As she died in the natal house of Pasteur at Arbois, in the Jura, the Minister for Foreign Affairs (Senator for the Jura), all the French scientists of renown, and delegates from scientific bodies from everywhere could not meet round her coffin in her Paris home, only in the church where the obsequies took place. That granddaughter who appeared in a blue frock standing at Pasteur's knee in a full-length portrait at the Salon came with the great-grandchildren. They were the delight of the old lady, and had kept in her company her eighty-second birthday, also her name-day. The book signed by those who attended the funeral is truly un livre d'or.

The mortuary house at Arbois is the home created by Pasteur's father on the bank of a fast-flowing river. He retired there as a veteran of the Grand Armée and set up a tannery, gaining an independence, and leaving property worth about 50,000 francs to his family. Pasteur made over his part to his sisters, on whose education far less money had been spent, and who did, in growing up, all the housework, thus economising the wages and other expenses of keeping a servant. In after life, he bought back the house—a very unpretentious one—and passed there his vacations. His widow continued to spend her summers there. The changes they both made were mainly hygienic and to add a little comfort. But luxury remained a stranger.

One saw in Mme. Pasteur a person of strong and sterling character. A man with her shapely and accentuated features would have been handsome. However, old age never seemed to have taken hold of her. She might have been handsome, or, at any rate, comely, when she made an impression on Pasteur that hurried him into writing to ask her in marriage from her father, M. Laurent, rector of the Strasburg lycée. The writer filled there the poorly paid chair of chemistry, that branch of science being held in 1850 in far greater honour at Heidelberg than in the chief town of Alsace. He had been noticed by his colleagues as a piocheur, or a delver in his scientific studies, and also by Mlle. Laurent. In the letter to M. Laurent he stated with the utmost frankness what his father's life had been, from soldiering to tanning hides on his own account; that his whole fortune could not amount to more than 50,000 francs; that in the event of his death he had determined to waive all claim to his share in favour of his two sisters; that since the death of their mother they had taken her place in the household, and were still unmarried. He further thought well to say that should he have the happiness to win Mlle. Laurent she must not feel disappointed if she saw that his laboratory filled his mind, and that he was too absorbed in it to devote to her much time and attention. His frankness, serious character, and the young lady's wish pleaded for him. She had the fullest confidence in his capabilities to leave, as she said, "a luminous trace in the world that would remain long after him." The promise she made to respect his devotion to science she ever kept. But she was released from it in their vacations. The humble house at Arbois seemed to them a paradise. The bliss of marriage is reserved for those who with a good and firm will face the drudgeries and the difficulties to which mankind are condemned. Pasteur did not always practise what he preached. I remember how when cholera had broken out in Paris he one day lectured at lunch on the danger of eating unwashed grapes. As he discoursed, which he did in an amused tone, on the danger he washed a bunch of grapes, for we were at the dessert stage. No sooner had he swallowed the last grape than he took up the tumbler in which he had purified them from all possible cholera germs and drank the water. Was this from absence of mind or incredulity as to his own theory? From politeness nobody at table asked him.

From the dead to the living: from God's Acre to the Grand Palais. The whole west side of that edifice, with entrance from the Avenue d'Antin, is devoted to the Autumn Exhibition of Fine Arts. This show differs from preceding ones in the Fine Arts not being confined to pictures and statuary apart from domestic or personal use. The eighteenth-century French diffused art in all directions. They brought it into fans, snuff boxes, rings, buttons, lockets, bracelets, Sedan chairs, the legs of tables, the bronze mouldings, wall decoration, and much else. The eighteenth-century paintings, before the late Prince Consort applied to them his Saxe-Coburg standard of taste, were just as valuable for their framing as for their pictorial excellence. The art that sprang up in that century amused and pleased the mind and fancy and delighted the eyes. The solemnity of the seventeenth century dropped away from it. I cannot think by what aberration of intellect and taste fine art came in the nineteenth century to be confined to hung pictures and statues. Was it because Napoleon's wars had brought about such wholesale slaughter of the class that best possesses its hands and is most fertile in furnishing artists and artisans?

The compliment recently paid by Munich to French music is returned at the Grand Palais to the Bavarian capital, which has a whole series of show rooms for its art furniture. It may be that they would agreeably affect any eye used to Bavarian standards of taste and the general atmosphere of Munich. They show marvellous technique in regard to handicraft. But it seems to me that ideality and fancy are wanting. There is striking, and, on the face of it, purposeful eclecticism. This conscious imitation, though accomplished laboriously, is not captivating. One finds a mixture of Renaissance Italy, modern Florence, German Gothic and French eighteenth century. The different styles seem to me ill-fused. The artisans had not slept long enough on their impressions for them, when they arose from their slumbers, to find their hands prompted by a composite notion, not consciously formed. There is no trace of that gallant intention which makes the French eighteenth-century art so gracefully amusing.

The circular lobby on the first floor, known as the cage, is as usual devoted to the eccentric or monstrous things. Some excite laughter, some indignation, according to the temperament of the visitor or the critic. This is just what the organisers of the show wish for. It is always good advertising policy to cut the dog's tail.

The influence of Cézanne was in former Salons d'Automne. It no longer is. Impressionism in mere pictures is much tamer, but greatly influences what it ought to influence: decoration.

M. Maurice Denis's eight decorative panels, four of which are large, are interesting, and I fancy will bear familiarity well. This can be said of so few pictures now. One of the big panels is denominated "La Danse," another "La Cantale," famous for its rock and oyster girls; the third gives "Baigneuse," and the fourth "Le Poëme." They bear the general name of "Soir Florentin," and have charm and ingenious grace unalloyed by affectation. He is supposed to have remembered direct impressions in the soft light of a Tuscan evening, and paint-brush in hand committed them to canvas. The atmosphere is conducive to dreaminess, but too many conflict with that state of mind. M. George Desvallières still forces his original talent. His "Christ" compels attention, and accords with the mental condition of those Bishops who call M. Fallières Diocletian. He must have found his model in one of those public and penitential flagellations that take place in Holy Week in the remote parts of Spain.

I never saw a nudity by a lady painter that pleased me. There is something in a man's eye that beautifies a Venus quite unrobed, whether by woven tissues, sea spray, or clouds. It is absent from the eye of every lady painter of talent that I can think of. Those of Mlle. Dufau are faultless in drawing, not open to criticism in regard of flesh. Still, they are not the right thing. Her contribution to this Salon is the continuation of her decorative paintings for the Sorbonne. The grouping is better than in her former exhibits. She has subtle art, science, a faultless technique, and she decorated a salon in Rostand's villa at Cambo, which he thinks ought to make her famous. And yet I hardly care for her nude "Geology," a variety of Venus sitting beside that mother of all living creatures, the sea, and holding in her hand a monovalve shell ringed round with involutions. "Zoology" is a youth who plays a flute to which charmed animals listen. They belong rather to the peaceable kingdom of Isaiah than to the wilds of Greece in the days of Orpheus. No woman painter likes violence or eccentricity. When boys are given pencils and paper at the Paris Board Schools and told to draw anything they please, they do motor accidents, trains running off the rails, tram-cars knocking over cabs and squashing pedestrians—in short, sensational horrors—unless they content themselves with machines. And this often happens. The girls do as well as they can nice home scenes: a neatly set-out dining table, a mother ranging vessels on a dresser, a child petting a cat, a hat or or bonnet, or a beautifully dressed lady.

Mlle. Dujardin-Beaumetz sends dainty but far from finical landscapes and marines, and Mme. Georgette Agutte sunlit landscapes pleasant to behold on a dark autumnal day. She has great talent in this genre, but forces her talent terribly when she goes in for the nude, which she sees at its ugliest.

Women excel as flower painters. Those of Mme. Devalvé and the "Fleurs d'Aconit" and "Bassin au Crépuscule" are delicate and very lovely manifestations of feminine art.

"Mlle. Polaire," by Dreyfus Gonzales, a tamed disciple of Manet, is so characteristic. She looks very like one of these brick-coloured Egyptians of the far back B.C. time, who appear in processions and wear a short kilted cotton skirt of the truncated cone outline. Her eye impresses one as does that of the old-world Egyptian. Polaire has gone in her own 60-h.p. motor to her olive-green house on the headland west of Cannes. Her negro Jemmy, imported by her from America, acted as chauffeur. The great success she met with in New York has embellished her. She is daft about Jimmy, though she calls him a monster, and blows him up for putting fourteen lumps of sugar in his cup of coffee. She fears a catastrophe, as when he works the steering wheel he constantly turns round to talk his nonsense to her. His excuse is that he likes to look at her and talk to her. When she threatens to send him packing back to America, where he will have to ride in a Jim Crow car, he says, "Oh, no, Miss Polaire, you would never be so hard-hearted. You are the best White Lady I ever saw, I can't think what your New York manager was about when he advertised you as the plainest woman on earth."

Polaire is expected shortly to rehearse in that forthcoming Vaudeville novelty, "La Maison de Danses." After her Paris season she goes back to New York, where she had an unheard-of success. As pearls like the sun, she wears in the daytime the string of these gems a group of New York enthusiasts sent her. Each pearl is as large as a hazel nut, and the string, after going once round the neck, falls in a festoon below the girdle.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

ENGLAND, dear Lady Betty, possesses the inspiration of the genius combined with the limitations of the ignoramus.

Add to the genius emancipation, education, and experience, and a glorious future is assured to the country.

We are afflicted with the most delicate Constitution on record. Every breath of fresh legislation and every proposed change of political treatment the Tories insist must cause the collapse of the British Constitution. In the Colonies the British Constitution has to "rough it" severely, and in them it thrives amazingly. At home, however, we have to sacrifice the vital interests of successive generations of the multitude, to wrap-up the Constitution closely and coddle it to prevent the illustrious invalid from succumbing.

The British Constitution is a veritable martyr to civilisation here.

The celebrated Scarron and his wife were very poor; nevertheless, most of those in France who had talent, wit, rank, or beauty attended their frugal entertainments. Mme. Scarron—who later ruled France as Mme. de Maintenon—was the soul of these informal suppers. One night the butler whispered to his mistress at table: "Tell them another story, madame, if you please, for we have no joint." Because the Opposition have no substantial policy to offer the electorate, the Tory politicians and journalists continually endeavour to distract the attention of the public with scares!

There was La Jeune France; in England there is La Jeune Finance. Young Finance in this country is truculent and unscrupulous, and to grow rich in an instant endeavours to use politics to disquiet the share markets. Unfortunately, the much-impoverished aristocracy of the country lends its influence to the speculating desperadoes to earn an inadequate and uncertain recompense. Money on the move is anybody's money is the guiding principle of the Young Financiers, and they will move stock to move money. The "Invasion" and "Socialist" scares, in disturbing the share markets and interfering with trade, have cost timid investors and the general public almost as many millions as would have paid for an ordinary war.

"Patriotism" with a purpose at times closely resembles treason.

A millionaire delivered an address in the Highlands last week, and the subject he chose for the occasion was "The Dangers of the Love of Gold." A report of the speech contains the following passages:—

"At a function in London he met a brilliant woman, wealthy beyond all human need, and occupying a powerful place in the political world. She was the companion of princes. While he was talking to her she said: 'Oh, Mr. ——, you are a financier; you can help me to get gold.' He was astounded, and replied: 'Why, my dear lady, surely you have gold enough. If I am not mistaken, you rank among the wealthiest women of the nation. You have social standing, and are famous throughout the country. Of what possible use can more gold be to you?'

"With quivering lips and blazing eyes she answered: 'Ah, you do not know me. I am almost ashamed to confess the truth. I dream night and day of gold. I want to have a room in my house filled with gold, where I could in the night-time bury myself in yellow sovereigns and hear the jingling of the music of the thing I love best.'"

It is for others to connect this with the story which follows:—

The late Father Gallwey was for many years attached to the Church of the Jesuits at Farm Street, Berkeley Square. He was an austere man and intolerant of evil. A penitent once was interrupted almost at the commencement of her confession by Father Gallwey asking, "My child, did I understand you to say you are not a pagan?"

Figuratively, our rich throw bank-notes at each other; luxury mostly amounts to that. Absorbed in the process and through the flutter of the precious paper the cry of those enduring privation fails to reach them.

They know not happiness who have not abandoned pleasure.

Mr. Edwin Thomas Sachs, who died at Holland House, Reigate, last week, was a true sportsman; a man who possessed all the finer qualities which should be associated with the word—for uprightness of character, kindness of heart, and loyalty in friendship he was unsurpassed. This slight tribute the present writer offers to the memory of an old and much valued friend.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

ROUND THE MARKETS.

A Recovery—No Failures on Pay Day—The Higher Bank Rate—New Loans—Cheap India Stocks—Railways and the Labour Position—Yankees Well Maintained.

AFTER being in a disgruntled mood for the greater part of the week, the Stock Markets put on a brighter face towards the end. The satisfactory completion of the Settlement had much to do with the change of sentiment, for after the latest bout of liquidation in rubber and other shares it was a distinct relief to learn that Pay Day had been surmounted without failures. The rise in the Bank Rate produced no ill effects. An advance in the official minimum from 3 to 4 per cent. is a seasonable movement and involves no hardship to the Stock Exchange or the general trading community. The rise a few days earlier from 4 to 5 per cent. in the discount rate of the Imperial Bank of Germany no doubt hastened action on the part of Threadneedle street, but in any case now that the reserve has got down to something like £25,000,000—allowing for the gold withdrawals made since the weekly return was made up—the need for mild defensive measures is easily seen. Already the question has been asked whether 4 per cent. will be sufficient to carry us through the year. Nobody except Old Moore will pretend to predict at this juncture, but if the Bank can to some extent offset its loans to Egypt and elsewhere by purchases of bar gold in the open market the probabilities are rather in favour of its being able to manage without recourse to a higher standard. It is so far satisfactory to see that the foreign exchanges are generally in our favour, and much above the level of a year ago, when the previous 5 per cent. Bank Rate was in force.

The release of the October dividends has been anticipated by a number of large borrowers. Issues of 7 per cent. Chinese and 4½ per cent. Russian bonds for railway purposes have been placed without difficulty, and an emission of £1,500,000 first lien and refunding 4 per cent. bonds by the Union Pacific was also readily absorbed. The City of Montreal has appealed for £1,000,000 in 4 per cent. stock. An issue of a more speculative type was that made by the Argentine Province of Corrientes, which placed about £400,000 6 per cent. bonds at 98. The credit of Corrientes has yet to be tested by British investors, and those unable to take risks had better choose something else. Consols have kept close to 80, and there has been little recovery in India stocks. The latter are worth looking away at present prices. They give yields of 3¾ per cent., which makes them stand out amongst their kindred. Colonial Inscribed stocks as a body yield from 3½ per cent. down to a trifle over 3¼. Not long ago the Stock Exchange used to rank India stocks above those of the London County Council, yet owing to exaggerated political fears the position has lately been reversed. The present price of India Threes is 80, which compares against 86⅛ for the 3 per cents. of the L.C.C.

The home railway market has continued under the labour shadow, but exemplifying the proverb that he who is down need fear no fall, prices have shown no important movements. The immediate future of the market is bound up with the development of matters at issue between capital and labour. A satisfactory outcome might easily start the market upward at a rapid rate. Meanwhile I regard Great Northern Deferred, Midland Deferred, Brighton A, South-Eastern 6 per Cent. Preference, and Chatham First Preference as amongst the bargains to be had. The Yankee market has again refused to take alarm over politics. Powerful interests in Wall Street appear to have the market well under control, and for the present they are adopting a moderately bullish attitude. Many factors at the moment are adverse to the bull party, but the American market is one in which long views are usually acted upon, and it looks as though the leaders are content to keep prices steady now in the hope of a business revival when the political uncertainty is over and the railroads—following the ruling to be given by the Inter-State Commerce Commission—know where they are in the matter of freight rates.

RAILWAYS.

Mexican Railway Half-year—First Dividend Earned on Ordinary for Nineteen Years—Argentine Railway Results.

The Mexican Railway dividend, announced last week, met sanguine anticipations. The company is paying in respect of the June half-year at the full rate of 6 per cent. on the Second Preference stock, against 2⅝ per cent. in the corresponding period of 1909, and ¾ per cent. on the Ordinary. The performance is noteworthy because this is the first time for nineteen years that the company has been able to distribute anything out of earnings upon its Ordinary stock, the old Mexican Railway since 1891 having been severely hit by the competition offered by the newer Interoceanic Railway. Since the advent to the chairmanship of Mr. Vincent Yorke the old Mexican line has been making rapid progress. The new capital raised in the form of Second Debentures has been well spent in the reduction of steep gradients and the acquirement of small branch feeders, while the introduction of oil fuel for the locomotives has involved substantial economies in working expenses. For the whole of the June half-year the company worked at an expense ratio of 51.14 per cent., against 53.3 per cent. in the corresponding period of 1909, and the operating percentage is now, according to the last two monthly statements, down to practically 50 per cent. Gross receipts in the half-year showed an advance of $510,800, and working expenses went up $180,900, the gain in net revenue therefore being $329,900. Taking the dollar at 24½d., which is near the average value, the improvement in sterling comes to £33,677. This is within a few hundreds of the extra amounts actually distributed. Debenture interest (now that the Second Debenture stock ranks for full interest and sinking fund) took £9,235 more, the advance in the Second Preference interest absorbed a further £17,077, and the ¾ per cent. on the Ordinary took £8,454.

The current half-year has opened well. Gross receipts for July and August showed an increase of $109,000, of which only a trifle of $1,200 went in increased costs, so that the gain in net revenue in the two months was $107,800, say, £11,000. For the December half of 1909 the company paid at the rate of 2⅞ per cent. on its Second Preference stock, and to raise the rate to the due 6 per cent. a sum of £16,500 is needed. As £11,000 has been provided as the result of only two months' working, it is fairly safe to assume that the full amount will be forthcoming with a margin over by the end of the year. Mexican 8 per cent. First Preference at the present price offers a yield of 5¾ per cent., and may still be regarded as cheap. The Second Preference stands at 95¼ cum. dividend, and assuming that 6 per cent. be paid for the year, the return to a present purchaser is 6½ per cent. The Ordinary at 51½ discounts prospects pretty liberally, and might be left to the professional speculator.

As was almost a foregone conclusion, the Buenos Ayres Great Southern and Buenos Ayres Western Railway Companies are paying final dividends which bring the rates up to 7 per cent. for the year 1909-1910, though in both cases the general results are of a less rosy character than a year ago. The companies were affected by poor wheat crops—the outcome of the frosts of December last—and by substantial increases in capital charges. The Buenos Ayres Western Railway had a nominal increase in gross receipts of £6,000, which was converted by higher expenses into a drop in net revenue of £27,100. Allowing for the increased balance brought into the account and an improvement in miscellaneous revenue, the net revenue balance was £12,000 up. As, however, to pay the same dividends took £90,000 more, and there was also a small increase in prior charges, the company was unable to put anything to reserve fund, as compared with £115,000 a year ago, and its balance forward shows a reduction of £12,600. The current dividend is to be paid, as usual, free of tax, but future distributions, it is officially announced, will be declared less tax, which means a drop of 8s. 2d. per cent. in the income which the stockholders have been in the habit of receiving. To the company it will mean a saving of not less than £40,000. The Buenos Ayres Western, in order to provide for the continuance of the uncompleted works and for the construction of the new underground line in Buenos Ayres, for which a concession has been granted, proposes to increase the capital from £18,000,000 to £20,000,000. As regards the current year, gross traffics since July 1 show a decrease of £22,400. This, however, is the legacy of last season's poor crops, and the real position turns upon prospects for the new crops, respecting which a favourable statement is expected to be made at the next meeting.

The Buenos Ayres Great Southern, in order to keep its dividend at 7 per cent., has had to forgo making appropriations to reserve, which last year benefited to the extent of £40,000, and to reduce the carry-forward by £45,000. As regards the current year, the conversion of £6,000,000 4 per cent. Extension shares into ordinary stock will, as I have several times reminded my readers, make an extra call upon net revenue if the dividend be maintained at 7 per cent. of £180,000. Against this, however, the payment of the dividend less tax, instead of free of tax, would, if such a step be decided upon, effect a saving of just over £60,000. While the company is thus set a task in 1910-11, it has in the past responded readily to increased demands upon it, and, given good crops, may again provide the wherewithal to maintain the dividend of 7 per cent. that has been paid without variation since 1899. But for some months to come crop advices and traffic returns will necessarily be watched by shareholders with more than usual interest.

RUBBER.

The Market Position—More Forward Sales—The Big Producers—Some Cheap Shares.

Baseless fictions as to trouble in the Lane and the impending failure of several leading houses, together with more circumstantial rumours as to the effect of over-speculation in Singapore and Shanghai, were the weapons used by the "bears" at the settlement last week. All, however, passed off satisfactorily, and such shares as were thrown on the market were absorbed without much difficulty. Prices cannot for ever continue to fall, and such selling as has taken place during the week is attributable rather to the closing of weak accounts than to the parting with stock by genuine investors. In the raw rubber market the weakness appears to be based upon the alleged existence of undisclosed stocks—and the rumour is obviously incapable either of confirmation or of contradiction. What, however, is clear is the fact that at this time of the year, when large contracts for the purchase of the season's Brazilian rubber crop are concluded in Para and Manaos, it is in the interest of buyers to depress the London quotation for the commodity. And so before the quotation goes higher it may have to go lower—temporarily.

The most puzzling feature of the recent course of the raw rubber market has been the position of the American buyer. As a non-participant in the share speculation he might have been expected to hold undistorted views as to the outlook for the raw material. Why, then, did he display so much anxious activity in concluding forward contracts at big prices for 1911 and 1912? The spring outlook, it is believed, justified the rise in prices, but American trade has since suffered a check which, while reducing the immediate demand for the commodity, is not likely to eventuate in any prolonged trade depression. From the investor's point of view a sharp fall would have been less dispiriting than the recent continuous scalping of prices; for, with the commodity at 6s. per lb., rubber-growing is as profitable an industry as one could wish to find.

The Most Complete List of Rubber and Oil Share Quotations will be found in every Saturday's issue of "The Financial Times," 1d. daily. On sale everywhere.

The present quotation for plantation rubber has now been reduced to a level equal to the average of the highest prices realised during the past five years, and in view of the figures given below, the element of abnormality may be said practically to have disappeared.

Plantation Rubber Prices.

|---|---|---|
| 1905 ..... | 6 9¾ ..... | 5 11 |
| 1906 ..... | 6 3 ..... | 5 5 |
| 1907 ..... | 5 10 ..... | 3 8 |
| 1908 ..... | 6 0 ..... | 3 2 |
| 1909 ..... | 9 8½ ..... | 5 1½ |

The low prices marked during 1907 and 1908 were, of course, the result of the American financial crisis, the rubber market being seriously affected for a few months during the end of 1907 and the beginning of 1908. Apart from this exceptional period the figures show the normal price of plantation rubber for the past few years, and having regard to the increasing demand for the commodity there is little to support the contention of those who look for a further fall this year. On the contrary, there are distinct indications that present conditions are merely the effect of a temporary disturbance of an over-sensitive market, and that rising prices this autumn will be followed by high prices next year. During the week forward sales for 1911 have been announced as follows:—

| | | | | |
| Anglo-Malay ..... | 10 tons at 6s. 11d. | ... | 25 tons at 6s. 2½d. |
| Golden Hope ..... | 2½ ,, | ... | —— |
| London Asiatic ... | 5 ,, | ... | 10 tons at 6s. 2½d. |
| Pataling ..... | 5 ,, | ... | —— |
| Selaba ..... | 2½ ,, | ... | —— |
| United Serdarg ... | —— | ... | 10 tons at 6s. 2½d. |

Prospectus estimates for 1911 have not in the case of any respectable company been based on figures so high as 6s. 11d. per lb., and an average price for 1911 of only 6s. per lb., or even of 5s., would allow the big producers to pay dividends more handsome than any which have yet been declared.

Holders of shares in the big producers may rest assured that the total of the dividends they will receive during the next seven years will be equivalent to the present quotations for their shares, and an investor who is in so strong a position with regard to his dividends need feel very little alarm if gambling by Chinese merchants in Shanghai or Singapore temporarily depresses the price of his shares. To the table which I published last week of shares which can be bought to give returns of from 10 to 16 per cent. I now add a list showing how far the companies referred to are from the limit of their development. As the result of tapping a little over 1,000 acres last year Anglo-Malay obtained over 500 lbs. of rubber per acre, and from portions of its estate it obtained over 800 lbs. per acre. When the whole of its cultivated area of 4,091 acres is in bearing and yielding an average of 500 lbs., Anglo-Malay's annual crop should be three times as great as it is to-day; and it follows, of course, that when that period arrives a net profit on its rubber of one-third the amount it now receives should suffice to maintain its current rate of dividend. Treating Anglo-Malay's acreage now in bearing and its untapped acreage as a whole, its average yield per acre is only 171 lbs. against the 500 lbs. which in a few years it will attain. In the following list I include similar figures for a number of the important producers:—

Estimated Yields per Acre for 1910.

| | Yield per acre from whole planted acreage. |
|---|---|
| Anglo-Malay ..... | 171 lbs. |
| Batu Caves ..... | 107 lbs. |
| Bukit Rajah ..... | 144 lbs. |
| Consolidated Malay..... | 190 lbs. |
| Inch Kenneth ..... | 145 lbs. |
| Kuala Lumpur..... | 258 lbs. |
| Ledbury..... | 63 lbs. |
| Linggi ..... | 170 lbs. |
| Pataling..... | 161 lbs. |
| Selangor..... | 252 lbs. |
| Shelford..... | 141 lbs. |
| Vallambrosa ..... | 206 lbs. |

Not a single company, it will be seen, approaches 500 lbs. per acre—a rate of yield which may well be exceeded—and Kuala Lumpur, which shows the largest yield, is making arrangements, I understand, to increase its planted acreage and thus further to strengthen its position. The figures, however, show once again the advantages enjoyed by the younger companies. Ledburys can now be bought to pay perhaps 10 per cent., and the natural increase in its crop should make for greatly enhanced future dividends.

There has been some activity during the week in the shares of the still cheaper companies, of which I gave a long list in last week's issue. Bandjarsarie has 450 acres of rubber nearly 4½ years old, 260 acres of about four years, and 225 acres nearly two years. While not actually dividend earning at present, it looks as if there should be a distribution as a result of operations for 1911. Jeram has 500 acres nearly four years old, some of which is now being tapped. All reports from the estates are excellent, and an output of at least 10,000 lbs. is expected this year. A substantial profit, too, was made by the company on the purchase and re-sale of the Carew Estate. Langkat Sumatra is in a very strong position, having 50,000 Para trees nearly five years old and 33,000 of about four years. The crop for eight months of the current year amounts to 23,000 lbs., and next year's earnings may be sufficient to warrant a dividend of about 20 per cent. Sempah should tap about 27,000 trees towards the end of this year.

Taiping is a cheap floriner quoted at 4½d. premium which is commanding some attention. The company has a planted acreage of nearly 2,000 acres, the purchase valuation was a very reasonable one, and Mr. Thomas Boyd estimates the production as follows:—

| 1910-11 | 55,000 lbs. |
| 1911-12 | 100,000 lbs. |
| 1912-13 | 175,000 lbs. |
| 1913-14 | 250,000 lbs. |
| 1914-15 | 280,000 lbs. |

Early and increasing dividends may therefore be anticipated.

Quoted now at a discount, Tempeh has attractions which my readers should not overlook. There are 106,133 Para trees already planted, of which nearly 39,000 are about four years old, and show excellent growth. The company has a variety of other crops, including a large quantity of coffee. Independent reports on the property are most satisfactory, and the growth generally is stated to be very good. The fully-paid 2s. shares are now quoted at 1s. 9d.

It must be an extremely difficult task for directors to please all their shareholders. A correspondent who is a holder of Demeraras writes to complain because that company is planting rubber instead of devoting itself exclusively to balata. My correspondent thinks that rubber is being overdone. Now, the Demerara company controls a very large area of indigenous balata from which it should reap substantial profits. Balata, of course, is a very useful product, and I have nothing to say against it, but as the tree takes twenty years to arrive at maturity, and should be tapped only once in five years, I think the Demerara company has acted wisely in relying upon its natural supply of balata, and confining its extension work to rubber.

Advice has been received from the general manager of the Madagascar company of a further shipment on the 1st inst. of 11,211 lbs., making the total shipments to date 106,104 lbs. The Malacca company's output of dry rubber for September of 33,000 lbs. establishes a new record for that company.

MINES.

Some Forced Liquidation—Globe's Interim Report—G.C. Amalgamated.

After displaying general dulness, during which time there was forced liquidation in more than one section in connection, it was said, with the financing of rubber commitments, the mining markets revived a little at the close of the past week, though business was still mainly professional in character. A little "shop" support served to induce some of the "bears" in the Rhodesian and Kaffir markets to repurchase, and, as usual when the general tone brightens, there was a modicum of fresh speculation for the rise among the bolder spirits in the house. A small but fairly general recovery in quotations occurred, but Monday witnessed further realisations, the shares in which French speculators have interested themselves of late being the weakest spots. Further forced selling in these markets in order to provide funds to finance other deals is feared, and at the time of writing there seems to be a fairly general disinclination to open fresh "bull" commitments but given a turn for the better in the rubber market mines would doubtless respond.

"Progress reports will be published periodically," the directors of the Globe and Phœnix announce in their interim report for the first half of 1910, issued last week. During the last twelve months I have criticised the management of this concern on several occasions in connection with the publicity question, and my readers may recall that only a fortnight ago I urged the directors, when milling was about to be recommenced at the mine, to make up their minds to issue fortnightly or at least monthly statements to keep shareholders in touch with developments. After an interval of two months crushing was resumed on the 27th ultimo, and for the remainder of the current year ore is to be milled "of such a grade as to compensate for the small output during the period of shaft repairs." Pending the resumption of remittances from the mine payment of a second interim dividend is postponed. As I mentioned a fortnight ago, high hopes are expressed by market "bulls" as to the probable outcome of development work at the Globe's seventeenth level in the next few months, and in some quarters the shares are being talked to over £3.

One or two of the principal West Africans have been affected by selling which would appear to have been in the nature of forced liquidation, and, although the immediate outlook may seem none too bright, I think those in a position to take up stock and await better business conditions might do worse than pick up Ashanti Goldfields and Gold Coast Amalgamated at current prices of 1⅞ and 2 11-16 respectively. The latter concern is stated to have cash and share assets equivalent to £2 10s. per share, so that the present market quotation allows little for the various properties owned, which include a large area on the Taquah banket range.

The "Johnnies'" Annual.

Twelve months ago, when dealing with the report of the Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Company for 1908-9, I suggested that this important corporation was "on a fair way towards making its last 10 per cent. dividend a pretty regular distribution under normal conditions." A similar distribution has been announced in respect of the financial year which terminated on June 30 last, and the report of the directors, which made its appearance at the end of last week, indicates that the resources of the company are not being strained in order that the dividend rate may be maintained, although the earnings were not so large as in the preceding twelve months. The accounts now in the hands of shareholders show that the gross receipts for the last financial year were £440,756, as compared with £511,063 for the preceding twelve months, while administration expenses amounted to £34,574, as against £32,749. Consequently, the net profit at £406,182 shows a decline of £72,132. With the amount brought forward from 1908-9 the total available balance, however, is £568,791, of which the dividend absorbs £395,000, leaving £173,791 (as compared with £162,609) to be carried forward.

In explanation of the reduction in earnings, the directors recall that during the greater portion of the year under review South African market conditions were not favourable, "which fact has somewhat limited the scope of the company's operations in that direction." Besides maintaining the dividend, however, they are able to present a balance-sheet which shows the financial position of the company to have been further strengthened. Below are contrasted the principal items of the last two "Johnnies'" balance-sheets:—

Truth Cautionary List for 1910, 128 pages bound in cloth, price 1s. net, by post 1s. 2d., is now ready, and may be obtained from all booksellers and railway bookstalls.

| | End June, 1910. £ | End June, 1909. £ |
|---|---|---|
| Investments in Stocks and Shares ... | 2,717,854 | 2,576,391 |
| Real Estate and Buildings ..... | 735,808 | 774,556 |
| Loans at short call..... | 1,270,909 | 1,158,766 |
| Sundry Creditors ..... | 365,911 | 706,505 |
| Contingent Liabilities ..... | 227,046 | 261,256 |

The net result of the changes is that the liquid cash assets exceed the liabilities by the sum of £1,040,855, which balance compares with that of £933,184 reported twelve months ago.

Some of the producing mines of the Barnato group have not been doing so well of late as formerly, and dividends have been reduced in certain cases. To what extent this affected the "Johnnies" earnings it is impossible to gauge, as the accounts lump together the receipts from all sources. The directors do not go into detail respecting the numerous mines the company is interested in, but brief mention is made of the New Rietfontein disappointment, and the fact is recalled that the "Johnnies" participated in two of the most important Rand flotations during the year under review —namely, the Government Areas (Modderfontein) and the big Cinderella amalgamation. In both these concerns "Johnnies" secured a large interest on very favourable terms. Other mines at the development stage in which the company is largely interested are the Consolidated Langlaagte and Van Ryn Deep, whose operations are stated to be showing very gratifying results. "Johnnies" shareholders will no doubt be glad to have this information, and also to read that the directors consider "the interests above referred to make effective provision for maintaining and increasing the company's mining revenue in future years," but a full list of the company's mining and other assets would probably be still more appreciated.

New African Company Rejoins the Dividend List.

Shareholders in the New African Company are about to meet with some reward for the patience they have had to exercise the last few years, payment of a dividend of 5 per cent. being recommended by the directors in the report issued during the past week. This is the first distribution announced since 1906, when 6 per cent. was distributed. In that year the company's shares touched extremes of 1 9-16 and ¾, but in 1908 they went as low as 5s. In the summer of 1909 the finances of the concern were reorganised, and this paved the way for a resumption of dividends. By the issue of 97,600 shares at par to the shareholders under a guarantee the liabilities were discharged and about £20,000 working capital provided. A further 30,000 shares have since been placed at a premium, and the total issued capital at the end of last June, to which date the accounts now presented are made up, was £283,760.

The accounts cover a period of eighteen months, and show a realised profit of £27,016. After payment of the 5 per cent. dividend recommended there will be a balance of £10,750 to carry forward. The period covered by the report was not a very favourable one for the company's operations, but the directors believe the return of confidence and normal times may reasonably be looked for in the near future, "and in this event the company is in an excellent position to realise its present holdings to advantage to deal with the new interests already acquired and to secure further sound business." The company has interests in various parts of Africa, its holdings including shares in the Welgedacht, Mozambique, New Egyptian, Taquah, Abosso, and Taquah Central companies. In Nigeria the New African Company has obtained a controlling interest in a lode tin property as well as in an alluvial tin proposition.

When New African shares were quoted at a sovereign, at the end of last year, I recommended a purchase as a promising speculation. During the current year the price has been up to 30s., but has now come back to about 17s., the shares having participated with most other descriptions in the recent depression. At this reduced level a purchase should prove profitable to those prepared to take the shares off the market for a time, as the company has some interests which are practically bound to appreciate sooner or later.

INDUSTRIALS.

The Daimler and B.S.A. Amalgamation—Lever Bros. and the Object of its New Capital—Egyptian Bourse Laws—English Companies' Grievance to be Met.

The week so far as industrials are concerned has been marked by few outstanding features. The labour troubles in the North have had little effect upon iron and steel shares, textiles, and the shares of allied trades, which is satisfactory as indicating faith in the general business outlook and a measure of confidence that the struggle between capital and labour will be of brief duration. The proposed amalgamation between the Birmingham Small Arms Company, Limited, and the Daimler Motor Company, to which I referred a little while ago, has now taken definite form. The businesses are to be joined together on the basis of four Daimler ordinary shares of £1 each being exchanged for five new £1 ordinary shares of the B.S.A. Company. The preference shareholders of the Daimler Company are to be paid off in cash at a premium of 5s. per share. In addition, provision will be made for the discharge of debenture premiums and other kindred matters. The terms seem to have been fairly devised, and as regards the utility of the union there is a good deal to be said. The Daimler Company obtains the advantage of the prestige which attaches to the older-established business of the Birmingham Small Arms Company, and its trading interests, instead of being confined to the building of motors, will be more widely diversified. By linking up with the older company it will also the more easily be able to raise the additional capital required for the development of its business, more especially the construction on a larger scale of the Knight silent engine, which has proved a very valuable invention. The Birmingham Small Arms Company will benefit from the fact that its premises, which have lately not been working at their full capacity, will receive a large amount of additional business from the Daimler Company and the operation of its patents. United the two concerns will become the premier motor manufacturing enterprise in the country, and the union should add to the stability of both.

The object of the proposed increase in the capital of Lever Bros. from £9,000,000 to £14,000,000 has now been officially explained. The new money is not required for extensions of soap manufacturing in the United Kingdom, but is to be applied gradually "for the purpose of making the company independent of the ordinary market in the matter of supplying raw materials necessary in soap-making." The chairman pointed out at the meeting held last week that in the past the company had been able to rest entirely upon buying in the market in the ordinary way of business at such prices as would enable it to make soap profitably. That state of affairs had disappeared, and soap makers, not only in this country but in America and elsewhere, were having to become their own oil crushers and their own producers of all the raw materials which they used in catering for a household article. In my list of suggested investments for women a week ago I included the 5 per cent. A preference shares of Lever Brothers, and I might therefore point out that the new capital which it is intended to raise, instead of prejudicing the position of the existing preference holders, will materially strengthen it, as the new shares will rank after existing preferences.

Egyptian shares, after a brief period of dulness, look like hardening again. Cotton in the Delta is coming up to best expectations, and the moving of a bumper crop should tend before long to reawaken the speculative spirit on the Alexandria and Cairo Bourses. It is interesting to learn too that there is a probability of modifications being made in the new Bourse laws which were passed last year and came into force a month ago. The most important point as affecting London is connected with the clause which prohibited the dealing in shares of a lower denomination than £4 except for cash. This admittedly placed English companies, whose shares are mostly of £1 denomination, at a disadvantage as compared with those of foreign registered companies, and I am glad to hear that the Egyptian Government will probably make a concession and decide not to enforce the clause.

In the oil share market interest has again centred in Shell Transports. Shares have continued to change hands with great freedom, and although a lower price level has been reached there were some sharp fluctuations. The immediate outlook for Shells remains uncertain, and the shares should be left alone just now by the outsider, but it is perhaps only a question of time before they get back again to 90s. The Maikop group has been quiet and inclined to dulness in the absence of support, though what news has come to hand lately from the field has been of a reassuring character. It is all to the good that the market is adopting a ing a policy of "Festina Lente."

The Yokohama Specie Bank in its sixty-first half-yearly report gives evidence of a flourishing state of affairs. Gross profits for the six months ended June 30, including £116,700 brought forward, amounted to £1,306,400, of which £1,010,100 was deducted for interest, taxes, current expenses, rebate on bills current, bad and doubtful debts, etc., leaving a balance of £296,300 for appropriation. The directors propose that £35,000 be added to the reserve fund, and that a dividend be paid at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, which will absorb £144,000. There will remain a balance of £117,300 to carry forward. This is the sixteenth half-year in succession in respect of which the dividend has been 12 per cent. The bank is in a very strong position; it has a paid-up capital of £2,400,000, against which the reserve funds amount to £1,660,000.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

British Coalite.

With reference to my paragraph last week concerning the position of British Coalite, Limited, a correspondent raises an important point in the following letter:—

Is the agreement between Coalite, Limited, and British Coalite, Limited, of July 6, 1910, wherein the latter releases the former from paying £174,009 5s., due to the British Coalite in cash a legal discharge? The consideration in the agreement for such release, as filed at Somerset House, is as follows:—

Coalite, Limited, issue to British Coalite Co., Limited, 10,000 ordinary shares of 20s. each, and also 12,500 deferred shares of 1s. each in Coalite, Limited.

British Coalite Co., Limited, issue to Coalite, Limited, 226,000 ordinary shares in British Coalite to Coalite, Limited, who pass to British Coalite 100,000 of such shares for them to raise money thereon.

Coalite, Limited, agree to the voting power of the deferred ordinary shares in British Coalite Co., Limited, being reduced from three votes each share to one vote for each deferred ordinary share so held.

That is all there appears to be in consideration for the loss of £174,009 5s. from a company whose shares were standing at the time at over £2 per share premium. According to a document filed at Somerset House, Mr. F. W. Salisbury Jones, exercising his call of December 31, 1909, applied on March 15, 1910, for 12,500 ordinary shares of Coalite, Limited, at £5 per share.

Will the issue of the £300,000 debentures provide any more actual cash than could have been recovered from Coalite, Limited, and that without mortgaging the company's property?

An Outside Broker's Offer.

Some weeks ago an outside broker at Manchester asked a holder of 4 per cent. mortgage debentures in the New Brighton Tower and Recreation Company, Limited, whether he wished to sell. He offered to sell at par, to which the outside broker replied with counter offers, first of £80 and subsequently of £82 10s. per £100 bond. The holder decided to keep his bonds, which were guaranteed by the Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society, Limited. They were due for redemption on September 30, and on Saturday he received notice from the company that the principal moneys would be duly paid on presentation of the bonds. I give publicity to this incident because I think it may be of interest and service to persons who, bearing in mind the fact that the Law Guarantee Society is in liquidation, may possibly be induced to part with securities guaranteed by that society at much less than their proper value.

Consolidated Oilfields of California.

In the remarkable speech with which he recently attempted to gammon the shareholders of the Consolidated Oilfields of California, Limited, Mr. V. Carter West talked very impressively about an inspection of the property by a party, including reporters of the Associated Press, whose report had been published in a San Francisco newspaper. The Associated Press, which is the chief American news agency, advertised in the Times last week a contradiction of Mr. West's statement. "Any statement," the advertisement ran, "that the Associated Press, or any authorised representative of it, examined and passed upon or approved this property is wholly incorrect." I commend this to the shareholders who were guileless enough to swallow Mr. West's speech. Circulars have been addressed to them in which the fact that reports of the speech appeared in a number of leading newspapers—such reports being, of course, advertisements—is put forward as a proof that "the British Press speaks of this as a proper (sic) English company." Whatever the British Press may say about it, some of the Californian newspapers characterise the company as anything but "proper." I have before me a copy of the San Francisco News-Letter of September 10, which on page 8 publishes a letter from an official of the California State Mining Bureau in reference to the Consolidated Oilfields. In one passage this official letter describes the company as a "rank wild cat," and in another it uses an even stronger term.

A Nigerian Blind Pool.

With the possibilities of the alluvial tin mining in Northern Nigeria I am favourably impressed, as previous notes in Truth have clearly indicated, but great discrimination is necessary when it comes to putting up money for the working of properties in that region. Of this I am reminded by the receipt of a prospectus-like document relating to "The British Nigeria Tin Company, Limited." These documents have been sent out by H. A. Weltner and Co., Limited, of Finsbury Pavement House, with a view to obtaining applications for shares, but it appears that, so far from having secured a property, or even an option on a property, "The British Nigeria Tin Company" is not yet registered. There is a consulting engineer in view—some generalities attributed to him, but which might have been written by anybody who had read up the subject, are quoted in the document—but his name is not given, nor are the names of the directors mentioned. In its present form, therefore, the scheme is practically nothing more than a blind pool, and that is the sort of thing I advise my readers to avoid.

The Career of a Company Promoter.

Before Mr. E. A. Tupper turned his attention to company promoting he was by turns a ventriloquist, a soldier, an actor, then a soldier again (serving in the Boer War), and afterwards a political lecturer. As a promoter he has brought out in the last two years or so companies for the exploitation of (1) a French railway guide, (2) a metal polish, (3) a gas cooker, (4) a sort of merry-go-round described as "the World's Derby," and (5) a Hungarian mineral water. I cull this information from Mr. Tupper's public examination in the Bankruptcy Court last week. It is not without interest as showing the sort of training with which a man may consider himself qualified to set up as an expert in the formation and flotation of joint-stock enterprises of the most varied description. At the same time the outcome of this versatile gentleman's experiences in company promoting is a proof that it is not always the lucrative business unfortunate investors sometimes imagine it to be.

"SANITAS" is the Brand or Hall Mark of value for Disinfectants of all kinds, for use in the House, Stables, Kennels, &c. Pamphlet free. The Sanitas Co., Ltd., Limehouse, London, E.

T. Morton Harris and Co.

In a circular dated from Victoria Buildings, Temple Row, Birmingham, T. Morton Harris and Co., "stock and share brokers," claim that they are the originators of a "new method of monthly profit-sharing deals." The circular bears the impressive announcement, "Entered at Stationers' Hall," but in spite of the law of copyright I venture to quote a sentence or two. "This system," its authors declare, "is not speculation. . . . We take no risks or chances. When we buy stock we cover the bargain by selling; so that in either event, rise or fall, we are on a profit." Wonderful! "Stock can only move in two directions, up and down;" therefore "common-sense dictates the wisdom of dealing both ways, so as to secure profit in either event." Think of that now! Here in the city of London dull, stupid "bulls" and "bears" have been fooling round the markets for years past without ever discovering how they can secure profits as a matter of course without taking risks. But at Birmingham this is regarded as a quite simple feat—so simple that T. Morton Harris and Co. not only undertake to perform it for the benefit of all and sundry, but give an "absolute guarantee" against the loss of the capital entrusted to them. Nor is this the limit of their benevolence. "To encourage thrift we permit customers to leave their dividends with us, such dividends are then added to the share capital and earn profit accordingly." I have never previously heard of this firm, but from the foregoing my readers can form their own opinion upon the novelty and character of this "new method." They will also be able to appreciate the humour of a scathing reference in the circular to some unnamed bucket-shop's circular as "the usual London clap-trap."

"My Financial Pilot."

Flamboyant advertisements in the daily papers make it known that Donald Douglas, Members' Mansions, 36, Victoria Street, S.W., kindly supplies, gratis and post free, "a little work containing much useful information for those who wish to increase their income by stock and share transactions." The title is "My Financial Pilot," that being, it seems, "the designation usually applied to Mr. Donald Douglas by an old and valued client during many years of continual correspondence." Glancing through this precious treatise, I find that its object is to persuade you to eschew dealings with the Stock Exchange and receive "the advantages to be derived from the economical and rational methods which are presented by Mr. Donald Douglas." His economical and rational—yes, he actually says rational—methods include the opening of speculative accounts with one per cent. cover—£5 "controls" £500 stock, or 25 American railway shares and so forth. In other words, if you are fool enough to accept Donald Douglas as your "financial pilot," he will steer you into the dangerous waters of a common bucket-shop. It is rather surprising that such a concern should be harboured in Members' Mansions. Douglas, I understand, has been the sub-tenant of an office in that building for about a month. He states in his pamphlet that for three years past he has been conducting "fortnightly syndicates in options" which have never once resulted in a loss. It would be interesting to learn where he has been doing this.

Ashton.

In a case in the City of London Court last week the identity of the individual running a bucket-shop under the high-sounding title of the Industrial Development Corporation was incidentally revealed. The Corporation prints on its notepaper the names of Laurence E. Copestake, T. J. Lambert, and Richard Entwistle, with L. E. Pratt, secretary. I know nothing about Copestake, Lambert, or Entwistle, but when examined as a witness in court last week, Pratt said that he was the secretary to one Ashton, "who was the Industrial Development Corporation." H. A. Ashton was, I believe, formerly connected with the cover-snatching concern known as the National Share Exchange.

NEW ISSUE.

Applications are invited for an issue of £450,000 six per cent. first mortgage sixty-year bonds of the Madeira-Mamoré Railway Company, guaranteed as to principal and interest by the Port of Pará at par. The price of issue is 92½ per cent. The authorised bond issue is £3,000,000, of which £1,800,000 has been taken by the Port of Pará and the Brazil Railway Company, who have agreed to finance the construction of the Madeira-Mamoré Railway, in order to provide the difference between the cost thereof and about £2,700,000 contributed by the Federal Government of Brazil. The railway will provide a quicker and cheaper route via Pará for the transport to Europe of the export products of Bolivia.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of Truth.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Carfax.—The shares are entitled to 6 per cent.

Huberis.—1. You might realise these shares, which are decidedly speculative, and exchange into one of the stocks recommended in last week's article.

Tenakoe.—The stock looks high enough, and I would not buy now.

Victor.—Dover A of the two, but I should prefer Great Northern deferred to either.

Mines.

Avenue.—1 and 3. I am not greatly attracted by either of these, although the first-named is being talked higher by some market men. No. 2 appears a good holding for dividends, and in a buoyant market they might have a moderate rise in price.

Cardigan (Leeds).—1. I expect to see some recovery in the mine's results and in the price of the shares before very long. 2. Prospects uncertain, and holding must be regarded as very much of a gamble. Conn.—They are somewhat speculative, but I know of no reason for advising an immediate sale. Cromdale.—They are all hopeful from a lock-up point of view. Intrinsically No. 3 is, perhaps, the cheapest. China.—1. I have dealt with the concern in my notes on several occasions during the current years. See article in Truth of September 7. Better take advantage of a moderate recovery to realise. 2. Not in the near future, as crushing has not yet been commenced, but I think the shares a hopeful lock-up. 3. You may get a somewhat better price by waiting.

Doubtful.—An exchange into Zinc Corporation ordinary and Oroya Links should prove profitable in time.

H. M. C.—The price at the time of writing is 5s. Your money could be more hopefully employed elsewhere.

Lawrence.—1 and 2. I have not seen a price for either. Better ask your broker if he can get a quotation. 3. A hopeful speculative lock-up. The dividend stage has not yet been reached.

Mercury.—They are all very speculative, and I think your money could be better employed elsewhere just now.

Paterfamilias.—Leave the shares to those who are trying to interest you in the syndicate.

Query.—1. Joining the scheme would be very much of a gamble. 2 and 3. Both are fair as speculations, with a view to a moderate profit when business becomes active.

Salopian.—1. I am not in a position to say whether the company's receipts this year will enable it to maintain the dividend rate, but think the shares should be held for ultimate recovery. With regard to the holding you mention, have you not confused the Ferreira Gold with the Ferreira Deep? Springfield.—A purchase of the shares named must be regarded as an absolute speculation.

V. A. F.—Yes; the price is about 5s. I know of no reason for expecting much advance. 2. Prospects very speculative, and I cannot say when dividends may be commenced.

Mixed Securities.

A. D. S. R.—1. A sound investment. 2. You apparently have not given the name correctly. I do not know any such issue. 3. You might select a second investment from the list published in the course of last week's article on "Investments for Women."

Bargain.—They are guaranteed by the Argentine Government, and therefore would make a sound investment. You will find particulars in the "Stock Exchange Year Book." Bendigo.—1 and 2. I do not recommend them or any other outside brokers. 3 and 4. I am not greatly attracted by either at the moment.

Country Mouse.—1. These might be sold, and the proceeds reinvested in one of the stocks recommended last week. 2. Avoid them and their recommendations as you would the plague. 3. Yes, hold them.

Dahlia.—1. A promising share; hold. 2. Keep them. 3. Prospects for Egyptian shares generally are good, and although the shares you have are little more than a gamble they might be held for a possible recovery in the next few months.

Elephant.—1. Worth holding. 2 and 3. Both sound investments.

Girvan.—1. Holding must be regarded as a gamble, awaiting full details of the suggested amalgamation. 2. Good speculative holding. I look for improvement.

H. B (Co. Down).—1. Have nothing to do with the firm. 2. A sound investment. 3. Not a concern with which I am familiar.

Ishmael.—1. Worth holding. See article this week. 2. I can predict no early improvement. Better wait for the next report. 3. A safe investment.

J. P. North.—1. The concern has been many times adversely criticised in Truth. 2. In the event of the two Kaffirs referred to rising above the figure mentioned, it might be as well to realise, but I see no reason at present to recommend a sale.

Mac.—Better make 5 per cent. the average return. See list recommended in last week's article. Mere.—1. Worth holding as a speculation. 2. Your money could be less speculatively employed than in these. 3. Hold for a better market.

N. O.—1. A good holding for dividends. 2. I would keep these. A dividend may be declared at the end of the year. 3. East Rand Proprietary. 4. You might select from an investment list given last week in the course of an article headed "Investments for Women." For males seeking 4½ to 5 per cent. the list is, of course, equally suitable.

Ralton.—1. A fair investment to give such a yield. 2. See article this week. 3. I do not recommend them or any other "outsiders." R. H. M.—I should sell both.

Spreat.—1. Speculative, but you might keep them for the present. 2. I do not advise a purchase. 3. Keep this stock. Scots Gap.—1. A purchase might yield a small profit. 2. Yes, at 80s. they ought to be worth locking away.

Vicarious.—1. A good lock-up for dividends, but I see no reason to expect much advance in the price. 2. Very much of a gamble. 3. The shares should be worth keeping.

Walmer.—1. A purchase would be very much of a speculation. See note in another column. 2. I have not seen any particulars of the property. 3. The shares must still be regarded as highly speculative, though they may turn out all right one day.

Rubber.

A.—Jequié, with a capital of £40,000, owns about 75,000 acres of land, and it should have made a net profit in cash and shares of over £20,000 on the flotation of West Jequié. The cost of bringing an acre of rubber into bearing is said to be about £10. The rubber realises about 6d. per lb. less than Eastern plantation, and the cost of production is estimated at 1s. 6d. per lb. Last season the exceptional drought affected the company, but tapping recommences this month, and you might now average as you suggest. A. G.—1. See reply to "A." 2. Capital sufficient for present requirements. Al Arak.—1. See reply to "A." 2. I think so. 3. Hold. Aloes.—1. The P.P.K. dividend was paid last June. 2. Linggi paid 50 per cent. interim in June, and has just declared a further 50 per cent. payable 12th inst. Airy.—1. The experts differed as to the value of Bukit Selangor, but I should not sell at present price. 2. Hold for recovery this autumn. But for capital appreciation I prefer low-priced shares in moderately capitalised companies whose estates are being rapidly and soundly developed. See my list of last week. 3. Promising. Alpha.—1. Market limited because number of shareholders is small. 2. I have a high opinion of North Hummock, and will refer to it. 3. Worth about 4 premium on a seven years' purchase basis. Aries.—1. See second reply to "Airy." Cannot fix limit until outlook improves. 2. More speculative, but very tempting at present price. Anglo.—I prefer Melimau, Bukit Mertajam, and Taiping at present prices. Anxious (Limerick).—A very fair list. Should improve. First group 1, 7, 8. Second group 2, 5, 6, 9, 10. More speculative 3 and 4. As to the latter, see reply to "A." Akroyd.—1. See second reply to "Airy." 2. Val d'Or is in good hands, but was described in these columns on flotation as somewhat heavily capitalised. Worth holding.

Bix.—Hold them all for a profit. Average Nos. 1 and 3 now. Write again later about the others. Bombay.—1. I criticised the issue on flotation, but at 10s. discount it should be sound enough as a lock up. 2. Glen Bervie. Bareilly.—1. See last week's Rubber Notes. 2. Not a favourite of mine. Bromley.—1. Certainly. 2. Hold for a steady improvement. Blind.—1. Hold for recovery. 2. I should sell. 3. Merlimau. Bamboo.—1. Straits Bertam are not overpriced, but you might advantageously exchange for Sempah at a little over par. 2. I would suggest dividing the sum available between the two groups—Kaffir and Rubber. Baveno.—As to Bukit Rajah, Highlands, and Linggi, see second reply to "Airy." Hold the others, and average your Malaccas. Basildon.—As to 1, 2, and 3, see second reply to "Airy." Hold the others. B. H. N.—1. Yes. 2. Yes. This year's dividend may be 20 per cent., and should increase yearly. 3. After close of year. B. B. Dun.—All well worth holding as investments.

Chelsea Form.—Both quoted at ¼ discount. Hold for recovery. No. 2 has speculative possibilities, but was not advised by me. Vine and General 10 per cent. Preference shares should turn out well. Write again after the meeting, which will be called before the options are exercised. No calls pending at present. Crescent.—A reasonable exchange, but for capital appreciation I should choose a cheaper share. Caesarea.—A very sound list. As to No. 2, see second reply to "Airy." Countryman.—Malaccas are worth holding as a permanent investment, and you might safely average now as you suggest. Clattar.—Both well worth holding at present prices. Soil and climate satisfactory. Market conditions responsible for the fall. Centaur.—All now earning profits. 1 and 3 should pay dividends for this year. No. 2 commences tapping next year, and is earning profits from tea. Cosmo.—1. See second reply to "Airy." Write later as to selling limit. 2. Sound enough, and I should not sell at present price. Cassa.—1. I have a good opinion of Merlimau. Prospectus estimates profit from tapioca, 1910, £6,500; 1911, £7,630. 2. Yes. Cecilia.—Your broker's remarks apply to Brazil, and not to Madagascar, where cost of production is much lower. Hold them all. Charles Norris.—See second reply to "Airy."

Duco.—Hold 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. Either increase your holding of Nos. 1 and 2, or buy Glen Bervie. Drum.—1. Aywara 5s. fully-paid are quoted ¼ discount-par, i.e., you can buy at par, but if you sell you get nothing. Very speculative. 2. See reply to "Cassa." 3. See last week's Rubber Notes. Drumos.—Worth holding as a speculation. For present purchase Taiping or Bukit Mertajam would be better. Dahlia.—Hold them all for steady improvement. Nos. 1, 2, 3, 5, and 6 are earning profits, but cannot estimate dividends at present. No. 4 should pay next year.

E. C. Watson.—Many thanks for your letter. Empire.—Sungei Bahru is well worth holding. Even.—1. Prospects fairly good. Guaranteed dividend payable January 1. Hold for the present. 2. Next year. Easy Chair.—Both good. Hold for recovery.

F. M. Morris.—1. Malacca should steadily recover, and I expect them to exceed your figure. 2. Cannot estimate dividend at present. 3. Not an unreasonable limit if you are prepared to wait. Fusilier.—1. I look for some improvement, but am doubtful as to your price being reached in the early future unless the raw rubber market materially improves. See second reply to "Airy," and instead of averaging buy Glen Bervie or Bandjarsarie. 2. Good speculative holding. May pay a dividend next year. Flagmark.—Taiping should suit you. Fogged.—See reply to "A." as to Jequié. Hold the others for steady improvement.

Goldsmith.—All excellent purchases at present prices. Profits from increased production should more than counterbalance any probable fall. Gunner.—The bankers acted as your agent, and were not at fault. Legally you are bound to accept delivery of the shares. Gervan.—1. See Rule 2. 2. Good speculative holding. Look for improvement. Grumps.—All sound. Hold as investments for steady appreciation. Guerra.—Hold them all for improvement, and write again at end of year. Gurkha.—1. Well selected, and all good for capital appreciation. All are profit-earning, but dividend dates not yet fixed. 2. Yes; for many years. 3. Should strengthen the company's position; and perhaps you are entitled to the Rubber Trust new shares, which are, of course, worth a premium.

Harold.—1. Your only remedy is against your brokers. 2. The solicitors were not bound to sell before they received the certificate, and you cannot recover the difference. 3. The Ayer Kuning issue was made on April 20, and your brokers are correct. 4. You can claim the Cluny shares, but brokers not liable for expenses or delay. Hall.—As to Linggi, see second reply to "Airy." Hold Beverley. I recommend present purchase of Glen Bervie for capital appreciation. Horwich.—1. See reply to "A." Cannot forecast output. 2. Allagar official estimates, 1909-10, 33,000 lbs.; 1910-11, 58,600 lbs., increasing to 151,300 lbs. in 1913-14. 3. I think you did well to sell. Halse.—1. Banteng is well managed. 2. Hold for capital appreciation. 3. Cannot estimate at present. Haverklip.—Sell your rights if you cannot take up the new shares. Helio.—1 and 2. See reply to "A." 3. A fair purchase. 4. 1912, I think. 5. The delay in delivery of Merlimau certificates is annoying, but you need not worry.

Interested.—Hold them all for substantial recovery.

Jelutong.—Crude Jelutong contains only about 10 per cent. of rubber. It is, of course, a competitor, but not a serious one, and the figures you quote are much exaggerated. J. E. (Liverpool).—1. Good speculative holding. Has good business in hand, but cannot fix selling limit at present. 2. No dividend yet paid. You might exchange if you wish. Julie.—1. Sound, but speculative. Hold for recovery. 2. A good holding. 3. Tapping recommences next month. Look for improvement. 4. Averaging is effected by making a further purchase at a lower price, so as to reduce the average cost of the whole. Hold Merlimau. Jelebu.—1. Capital reasonable in view of planting programme. 2. You might make the exchange, but Tanjong Malim is in a better district, may sell a portion of its land, and the shares have a free market. 3. Yes. 4. 1912. 5. No. It is quite sound. John Spiers.—Sorry. I now look for better markets. Hold your shares for steady improvement.

King.—1. Hold for an improvement before the end of the year. 2. Next year. 3. Now earning profits, but dividend date not yet fixed. Kanny.—1. The company is in good hands. Await detailed report from independent expert. 2. Is now exporting rubber. 3. Should develop rapidly next year. 4. Rubber is of good quality. 5. Good speculative holdings. 6. See last week's Rubber Notes.

Lambruin.—See reply to "A." Hold the other for improvement, but, instead of averaging, buy Taiping. Leinster.—1. Very strong board, but purchase valuation was somewhat high. Good enough. 2. Merliman is a safe lock-up. 3. Look for steady improvement. Ledi.—Hold 1 and 3, and average both if you can. As to No. 2, see second reply to "Airy." See Rubber Notes.

Minden.—1. Not recommended, but hardly worth selling at present price. 2. Yes. 3. Yes. A sound dividend-payer. Market Drayton.—As to No. 1, see second reply to "Airy." Hold No. 2. Moveen.—1. Buy Glen Bervie. The other is very promising, but more speculative. 2. I think so.

Navy (Dominion).—At present price Malacca debentures are a sound investment holding. The option to convert does not expire until 1914, and you should not convert at present. Notches.—I agree with the advice given, and should hold the shares for steady appreciation. Nosilla.—Hold 1 and 2, but sell No. 3 at reasonable opportunity. Nip.—I should not choose it. Buy Glen Bervie. Navy (Sutlej).—1. Quoted at about par. See Financier daily. 2. I should sell. Nogard.—1. I estimate 13s. 2. Bukit Mertajam is now the cheaper of the two. 3. Looks wonderfully well on paper, and is cheap. The growth, however, is not first-class. I should prefer Glen Bervie. Nemo.—Yes. Taiping is quite good at a trifling premium. Capital, £210,000. Output estimate, 1910-11, 50,000 lbs. Year ends September 30. Nestor.—You take quite the right view. Nos. 1, 2, and 3 are sound investments on a seven years' purchase basis, but the others should show much larger capital appreciation. (a) Yes. (b) Yes. (c) Not particularly attractive. (d) Glen Bervie, Bandar Sumatra, and Jeram.

Oto.—A very poor lot. 1. Worth holding at present discount. 2. When you see a profit take it. 3. Frequently criticised in these columns. Watch for an opportunity to sell. Old Hand.—I should not make the exchange. Hold Malacca for a profit. Old China.—I agree with your broker. Retain them all, and increase your holding of 2 and 3. Oakbank.—1. I do not think the prospectus' estimates will be realised. Watch for an opportunity to sell. 2. Both promising speculations. See reply to "A." Oriental.—1. Hold. 2. Yes; wait. 3. Tandjong is a very fine property. By all means hold your shares. Output estimate, 1913, 200,000 lbs.

Puzzled.—Good speculative proposition. In good hands. Should develop well next year, and averaging will probably be advisable later. Pulo Brani.—Cannot trace letter. Hold the shares as a speculation. The delay in issuing the certificate is annoying, but you must wait. Palmer.—1. May safely be held for dividends, but see second reply to "Airy." 2. Good holding for appreciation. Cannot estimate dividend at present. 3. See reply to "Puzzled." 4 and 5. Yes. I think so. See reply to "A." Prospice.—1. Should not sell at present price. 2 and 3. Sound holdings. Puggy.—Yes. A promising speculation. Pericles.—Tapping recommences this month. Hold your shares. See Rule 2. Price King.—Glad to hear of your successful deal in Jequié. Try again, as you suggest.

Quatre-Bras.—I agree. The future belongs to the younger companies. Keep both as investments.

Rob Roy.—1. See first reply to "Nogard." 2. Very cheap now, but limit too high. 3. Yes. Hold all for the present. Robin.—You might do so as a promising speculation. Rhubarb.—No call just at present, but you might do as you suggest. Rainbow.—1. Hold for a better price. 2. Next year. 3. Partly paid shares are usually quoted in this way. Rhino.—Hold them all for a few months, and then write again as to limits. Roberts.—See reply to "A."

Stourton.—See second reply to "Airy." Buy Nos. 2 and 3; also Glen Bervie. Swallow.—1. Should show a substantial improvement. 2. I think so. 3. Glen Bervie. Sprat.—1. First-class as a dividend-paying investment, but for capital appreciation I prefer low-priced shares. 2. Quite good. See second reply to "Airy." 3. Glen Bervie. Singapore.—A sound holding. My information was semi-official, but new purchase not yet completed. Await report, now about due. Sanguine.—(a) Taken as a whole they should reach your figures again. Look for substantial recovery in 1 and 3. No. 6 should steadily improve. Nos. 2 and 5 have good speculative possibilities. (b) I should select 2 and 6. (c) Demonstration to shareholders shortly. Nothing yet decided as to meeting. School.—Both unfavourably noticed in these columns. No. 2 is the better. Smiler.—See reply to "A." Starbeck.—Both good. Prefer No. 2. Cannot fix limit at present. Snave.—1. Total number of trees, 663,221. See Financier Handbook for details. 2. The shares taken over were: Anglo-Malay, Pataling, United Serdang, Golden Hope, Lunuva, London Asiatic, and East Indian Tea and Produce. 3. See reply to "A." Scots Gap.—Quite good. Worth averaging. Market depression cause of fall. Scrub.—See second reply to "Airy." Slainte.—1. No. 3. 2. Management good in each case. Anglo-Ceylon a sound holding. 3. No dividend yet paid. Shanghai.—All good, and can recommend No. 3, but cannot fix limit at present.

Tasmania.—1. Buy Langkat Sumatra. 2. Cannot advise as to Kombok. Trivial.—See reply to "Puzzled." Thermos.—1. Good company, but purchase valuation was high. Worth buying under par. 2. I should say not before 1912. Tom Tit.—a. I look for a substantial rise. b. See Rule 2. Ten.—See second reply to "Airy." Trux.—1. Unpromising. 2. Bukit Mertajam. 3. Taiping below par is attractive. Toiler.—Thanks for correction. Hold your shares for substantial improvement, but cannot fix limits at present. See reply to "A." Truro.—I have a good opinion of 1 and 2, and you might safely average. As to No. 3, see reply to "A." Hold No. 4. Troubled.—1. No. Wait for the meeting which will be called before the options are exercised. 2. Hold for recovery. The property is developing well, and shipments will increase. 3. Hold. Tenakol.—Both excellent. Hold.

Uncertain.—1 and 2. Sound. Hold for recovery. 3. You paid 4s. 3d. Now quoted at 1s. 3d. Not worth selling now, although I expressed an unfavourable opinion of this concern on flotation. Unger Hall.—1. I am afraid not. Outlook has changed. 2. Limit too high, but look for substantial recovery. 3. See reply to "A."

Vive ut Vivas.—1 to 5. Very sound. See first reply to "Fusilier," and second reply to "Airy." 6. No. 7. See Rule 2. Veltex.—Yes. Average both as you suggest. Delay in delivery of certificate is unreasonable. Violets.—1. Has speculative attractions, but I should not buy more at present. Uncertain as to dividend. 2. Reasonable price. May earn 60 per cent. dividend this year. 3. Way-Halim is overcapitalised, and I do not expect a dividend this year. 4. Yes. Taipings are a good purchase. 5. I do not like the concern. 6. Next year. 7. You want too much. 8. Not this year. 9. No. 10. No. Cheap.

Wasp.—The shares are of 2s. each, and the quotation is in pounds.

Xora.—1. Glen Bervie. Sound and non-speculative. Good for steady capital appreciation. 2. Tapping commences next year. 3. Quite good. Xallit.—1. Recommend present purchase. See reply to "A." 2. Substantial profits. Say average of 6d. per lb. on output. Xab.—1. Good speculative purchase. 2 and 3. Good for steady improvement. Average now as you suggest.

Zed.—1. Rambong area was excluded from my calculations. 2. Bukit Mertajam 6, 153, 433, 326, 386, and 1,200 acres planted in 1905-6-7-8-9-10. Total 2,508, to be increased to 3,500 acres. Board includes chairman of Linggi. Growth satisfactory. 3. Cannot say.

Miscellaneous.

A. (Stanmore).—1. I should sell on a moderate rally. 2. The company came out with fair prospects of achieving success, but little information has come to hand since the prospectus. Amico.—Put it in the Savings Bank, and when it increases to £100 write again. Afghan.—1-2. See reply to "C. C." The same statement applies to Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. 3. No.

Bargain.—1. A hopeful gamble. No dividends yet. 2. If you use the word investment advisedly leave oil shares alone. Maikop Pipe Lines are good as a speculation.

Coley.—Both sound shares, and I think you might stick to them. C. C. (Tientsin).—I have repeatedly explained that Melville, Glynn, and Co. charge prices for the bonds greatly in excess of their market value. Castell.—1. Well-known members of the Stock Exchange. 2. The shares are 5s. fully paid, and stand at 2s. I fail to understand the transfer. C. N. (Harrogate).—A laudable programme, but all depends on how it is carried out. For the present I am not going to recommend the concern, but mean to "wait and see."

Electra.—See second answer to "A., Stanmore." Even.—1. A promising speculative lock-up. 2. The chairman promised one. 3. Sell on a moderate recovery.

Frank.—Both worth keeping.

Homo.—You had better sue them. I believe other customers have taken that course, and, if desired, I could place you in communication with the solicitors who are acting for them.

Jap.—A concern of which you should keep clear. As you seem to understand, no sound institution offers such a high rate of interest. J. P.—No.

Keego.—Apply to Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 31, Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Mab.—It is new to me, and I shall be glad of any further particulars you can send. Meanwhile, the high interest offered on deposits is in itself a sufficient reason for avoiding this concern. M. M. W.—Reference is made in another column to the circulars of T. Morton Harris and Co.

Oversea.—My opinion is unfavourable. See reply to "Jap."

Park Road.—I should sell the shares for what they will fetch. Poo-Tung.—1. See reply to "Afghan." 2. Write to Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 31, Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Reefs.—As a lock-up No. 2 should be all right. As regards the other two they are of a rather speculative character, and you might select instead one or two of the securities recommended in last week's article. Rex.—I regret that I am not in a position to give you information as to this. Reliable.—The balance-sheet reads well enough, and I should have little hesitation in putting a portion of my capital into the concern. 2. Very hard to say which is the more promising. I regard them both as good value. R. A. M. C.—I criticised the offer very severely in a paragraph some weeks ago. It looked nothing more than a flat trap. Russia.—Very little information to date. Better await the report. R. R.—See reply to "M. M. W."

Spes.—Both 1 and 2 might be held for the present, but as your capital is small I do not advise you to buy more oil shares, which should be left to those able to take risks. 3. The special settlement takes place to-day. I cannot recall having received your previous letter. Sujet.—1. No. 2. United States Steel preference might suit. Sparklet.—See reply to "M. M. W."

The Bat.—Of course, the so-called offer is a mere trick. Duncan, Forbes, and Co. have been frequently exposed in Truth. T. W. (Whitby).—See preceding reply. Thorough.—The company has various mortgages outstanding, but only the 4½ per cent. debenture stock is quoted in the Official List. The stock you have should be worth holding. Thor.—1. The debentures are very fairly secured. Tod Sloan. Having bought the shares, you must pay the instalments. Had you asked my opinion before buying I should certainly have advised you to leave the shares alone.

Vera.—Regret that I have no information.

Waverley.—I have a poor opinion of the outlook for the company, and would get rid of the shares. W. C.—See reply to "The Bat."

VIGILANT.

INSURANCE.

Correcting an Error—Attractions of Limited Payment Life Policies—Bad Advice from Bank Managers and Solicitors.

"OPEN confession is good for the soul," and I have to point out that I made a clumsy mistake last week in stating the annual premium for twenty-year endowment insurance. I said I had taken the rate for a non-profit policy, whereas in fact I took the rate for with-profit assurance.

My argument was that a man could take a twenty-payment life policy under which the sum assured is payable at death, and at the end of twenty years, after all the premiums had been paid, he could surrender that policy for a cash payment which would exceed the amount payable under a twenty-year endowment assurance policy. The endowment provides for the payment of the sum assured at the end of twenty years or at death, if previous, and the rate of premium is higher than for a corresponding twenty-payment life policy.

Now let me give the facts with the correct figures instead of with the incorrect ones that I used last week. The twenty-payment life policy taken at age forty would cost £42 15s. 10d. a year for the assurance of £1,000 with profits. A non-profit twenty-year endowment would cost, say, £47 10s. a year. If therefore a man took a twenty-payment life policy at a premium of £47 10s., which is what he would have to pay for the twenty-year endowment policy, he would obtain a life policy for £1,110. The sum assured under this policy would be gradually increased by bonuses to £1,400 in the event of death in the twentieth year, and after the twenty annual premiums had been paid the policy could be surrendered for a cash payment of £1,032.

Hence a well-chosen twenty-payment life policy is better in every way than a non-profit endowment assurance effected at the same cost. It secures a larger sum for the man's estate in the event of his death within the twenty years, and the amount of cash for which the policy can be surrendered at the end of the twenty years is more than he would obtain from the endowment assurance policy. At the end of the twenty years he has nothing to do but draw the cash if he has taken the endowment policy, but under twenty-payment life assurance he can either take the cash or he can let the policy continue and earn further profits, so providing £1,400 with bonus additions every year until he dies.

If the limited payment life policy and the endowment assurance policy were equally well chosen, the endowment would yield him the more at the end of the twenty years and the limited payment life policy would yield the larger sum in the event of his early death. What I maintain is that it is better for a great many people to have the larger amount of protection that is afforded by limited payment life policies, and to be content with a smaller sum at the end of a fixed period. As I explained last week, it is important to consider the terms on which policies can be surrendered, since if these are illiberal a limited payment life policy cannot with advantage be converted into endowment assurance without substantial loss. If surrender values are of a generous character, this conversion to endowment assurance can be effected to advantage.

A further point is that the limited payment life policy presents a very useful degree of elasticity. The owner can convert it into cash at any time he likes. It can be within the twenty years, before he has paid all the premiums, or it can be at any time he chooses after the twenty years has expired. Of course, the longer he leaves it before converting it into cash, the larger is the amount of money he obtains, and the greater is the amount of protection provided for his estate in the event of his death.

There are yet other attractions about limited payment life policies. If a man takes ordinary whole life assurance for which he has to pay premiums as long as he lives he may experience two bad things. One is that the payment of premiums in old age may prove inconvenient, since quite possibly a man may have retired from work and have a diminished income in consequence. Another drawback is that if he lives to a very advanced age it may happen that the policy turns out a comparatively bad investment. This is certainly so in the case of non-profit policies and under participating policies that receive small bonuses. If the bonuses are large and increase in amount at each declaration the bonuses may more than compensate for the numerous premiums that have to be paid by any one who lives to an advanced age. But even so the benefit of living long enough to receive many bonuses is diminished by the necessity of having to pay many premiums. Under a well-chosen limited payment life policy the man who lives to a great age receives the full advantage of many and large bonuses unaccompanied by the drawback of having to pay many premiums. Especially when policies are taken fairly early in life the difference between the premium for limited payment life policies and that for ordinary whole life assurance is not great, and one of the many advantages of assuring early in life is that a man can afford to take a limited payment life policy which might be too expensive for him if he deferred assuring until middle age.

When I see an abuse I want to hit it, and I came across a case the other day which seems to me typical of many others. The man proposed to take a life policy in a certain company and conferred with his bank manager about it, and judging by the advice given the manager knew nothing about life assurance. He told his customer that the particular company in contemplation could not be recommended. He hinted that it was unsafe, whereas in fact it was perfectly safe, and for the purpose proposed very good. The bank manager is agent for another office, which he recommends on all occasions, and for sending proposals to which he receives commission. If a bank manager can prove that the company which he represents will give better results to the policy-holder than another office, well and good. Let him argue his case and earn his commission if he can, but to say that a sound office is unsound is by no means fair play.

In my experience, bank managers seldom know anything about the relative merits of different life offices. They are very frequently the agent of some one office or other, and I venture to think are not at all the class of men that people in their own interest should consult about life assurance.

The same remark applies to solicitors, although in regard to these the case is better than it used to be before the recent legislation against secret commissions. Solicitors of the highest standing never took commission on insurance proposals, but many respectable firms used to do so. Respectable firms discontinued accepting commission when the act referred to was passed, but I suppose there are some solicitors who are neither high class nor respectable and still take commission. It is not so much the commission as the advice that I am concerned with, and I am confident that I am right when I say that very few bank managers or solicitors know enough about life assurance to enable them to advise their clients well.

Good advice about life assurance may make a vast difference to the return which a policy holder obtains for his money. To some extent at present, and increasingly so in the future, good advice is and will be obtainable from members of the Incorporated Society of Insurance Brokers and Agents. This society is under the control of first class men, and I hope that in course of time it will become the recognised thing to go to members of this society for all insurance purposes, in the same way that one now goes to recognised accountants, solicitors and doctors in connection with the subjects in which they have specialised.

Answers to Correspondents.

B. C. W.—I replied to you previously, saying that in the circumstances I thought it would be your best plan to transfer. Taxi.—Any company will quote the premium for the policy you want, but rates are seldom published in prospectuses. You would certainly be entitled to rebate of income tax. Obtain quotations from Scottish Amicable and Mutual Life Assurance Company of New York. Consider the question of surrender values as mentioned in my article this week and last. Macroom.—In all the circumstances I should advise you to accept the offer and change your policy. B. J. G. (Margate).—I should distinctly advise you not to effect your insurance with the company you mention. Pru.—I am sending you some details by post. The passing of the examination should make you both better qualified for your work and at the same time improve your prospects. Derf (Glasgow).—Scottish Amicable or Scottish Life. Clover.—The Clerical, Medical and General is the best office for your son. I fancy you would find a later age than forty more suitable. I am afraid the company in which you have shares is not likely to do any good, and should advise you to sell the shares as soon as you can, especially if they are not fully paid up. Geo. B. C.—I believe both the society and the company to be quite sound and good, and the shares are likely to pay well in the long run. Basingstoke.—You have made a most excellent choice, and cannot do better.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

BRITISH, FOREIGN, AND COLONIAL CORPORATION, LIMITED.

The statutory meeting was held on the 28th ult. at the offices, 88, Bishopsgate Street Within, Mr. John Robert Tennant presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his address to the shareholders, said:—Gentlemen, from the notice which you have had an opportunity of studying you will see that 100,007 ordinary shares have been issued for cash and £25,000 has been called up and paid. The total of deferred shares—namely, 10,000—has been issued and paid in full. The corporation has been formed primarily to act as expert advisers to the public in the investment of capital, having regard to the most profitable return on the money compatible with the safety and stability of the original amount involved.

It is probably no exaggeration to say that not more than one person out of every 100 who has control of capital has any notion of the proper way to invest it, and this applies as much to actual business men as to those who are described as of no occupation. An individual is left a legacy, or, it may be, the profits of his business or profession are such as to require the investment of a sum of money. He invites the advice and assistance of friends, who, in all good faith, recommend him to invest in this or that security, which yields a certain rate of interest in some outside enterprise whose securities are not known on the Stock Exchange, "because I know they are doing very well." So they may be, but when it comes to realising, and he wants his capital back again, he finds, owing to unforeseen causes, the greatest difficulty in doing so; and we often hear people say, "Oh, I've got a lot of money in so and so, but I can't get it out," or, "If I were to sell now I should make a heavy loss." Then there are others who, with an idea of increasing their capital, place their money in a stock because they hear from one source or another that it is "good for a rise." They do not take the trouble to try and find out why it is "good for a rise," and even if they did try they would have no special facilities for obtaining information. I may say here at once that we have nothing to do with business of this nature. It is hardly to be supposed that any individual, especially a busy professional or business man, can obtain the information, even if he could find the time to thoroughly analyse the merits or demerits of the thousands of securities in existence, not to mention new issues, many of them apparently offering the same amount of interest. This, then, is what the British, Foreign, and Colonial Corporation can help him to do.

The essentials of successful investment may be summarised under four heads:—(1) To average the risk by spreading one's capital in equal parts and in securities of the same grade, over the whole of the earth's surface, adopting for this purpose certain well-defined investment areas. (2) To keep a sharp watch over the general trend of events—the value of money, the crop outlook, the course of trade, political conditions, etc., in the different countries comprising each investment area. (3) To follow carefully the development of each undertaking in which money has been invested, and with this end to scrutinise searchingly the annual reports and balance-sheets, and any other particulars available. The lower the grade of security held, the more imperative is the need for this regular supervision and investigation. (4) To watch the quotation of all securities of similar grade and class in the same investment area, including new issues offered for public subscription, and to change from one security into another of equal quality as soon as the discrepancy of price and general conditions warrant such a course.

With the means at our disposal we think we can do better for the investor than he can for himself. We have nothing to do with speculation or speculative business. No genuine investor wants to speculate, and it is for the genuine investor only that we are here. From time to time we may join in the guaranteeing—or underwriting, as it is called—of new issues, such as Government and municipal loans, and securities of undoubted excellence, which, with our very substantial connections, we should have no difficulty in obtaining; but you may be quite sure that the same strict scrutiny will be applied in every case, as is done with already quoted securities by our statistical department. We have a complete information department, deriving its opinions and advices from our agents and correspondents in all parts of the world, and based upon the daily course of events which may influence the stock markets. Customers of the corporation are cordially invited to use the library and files of the various financial journals kept for the purpose, and all inquiries are answered free of charge.

We are prepared to give a report and criticism on a list of investments, a fee only being charged for drawing out a scheme for rearrangement. On this being accepted, and we are instructed to do the investment business through our dealing department, this fee is credited in the brokerage charges, which are the ordinary ones customary on the London Stock Exchange. The dealing department is completely equipped for the efficient carrying out of any business entrusted to it, and, as only quoted securities are dealt in, customers can always check the prices obtained or paid for any stock by the official Stock Exchange lists. We, of course, do not claim to be a philanthropic institution, and we expect to make good profits for our shareholders, but we do claim that by benefiting them we shall be benefiting investors who give us their business by means of the system I have outlined. I have in my hand "A Primer of Scientific Investment," which has been prepared in the publishing department of this office, and I think anybody who reads it will be impressed by its contents. Our shareholders, I think I am right in saying, received copies of this book last week, and I understand that this morning it is on sale throughout the country, and that orders have been received to a very satisfactory amount. (Applause.)

A vote of thanks to the chairman and directors closed the proceedings.

DICK, KERR, AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

The ordinary general meeting was held at the Cannon Street Hotel, Mr. John Kerr presiding.

The Secretary (Mr. Frank Mott) having read the notice calling the meeting and the auditors' certificate,

The Chairman first referred with great regret to the death of Mr. George Flett, the late managing director, as the result of a motor accident at Birmingham on July 27. Mr. Flett had been associated with the company for nearly thirty years. Mr. Rutherford, who had for a number of years acted so ably as assistant managing director, had been appointed managing director. Continuing, the Chairman said: Regarding the past year I am sorry to say the views expressed at our last meeting—and I might also include the year before—as to the extreme competition in the electrical trade have proved only too true. Naturally, with a demand none too brisk, prices were likely to rule low, but in many cases figures were quoted by some firms below the cost of production. In times of depression all industrial concerns have to face restricted profits, but there is a point where discretion should cry a halt. Foreign competition also helps to aggravate matters. After three years of dull times a period seems at hand when there will in many directions be a great expansion of electrification in this country and abroad. When this is realised there will, I trust, be plenty of work for all concerns engaged in the industry. The earlier anticipation of progress in electrification may have been disappointing, but in some respects the delay may prove, after all, of advantage to buyer and seller. The year now being dealt with must be equally a disappointment to you and the directors. The future is brighter, and, without holding too optimistic views, your directors are of the opinion that the work at present on hand and in prospect makes the outlook distinctly encouraging. In a period such as we have gone through it may be a satisfaction to you to know that in matters of depreciation and other provisions your directors have in no way departed from precedent, and everything has been dealt with in the most careful and conservative manner as in the past. The policy of keeping in reserve a goodly sum in times of prosperity has been fully warranted. Your directors feel justified in trenching on the carry forward on this occasion, but it is their earnest hope that it will be the last. The financial position is one of comfort. As you will see by the balance-sheet, we have in bills £22,565 16s., cash, £69,949 18s. 10d.; and investments, £139,227 18s. 8d., or, together, £231,743 13s. 6d. Regarding the investments, at the price at which they stand in the books the return is a little over 6 per cent. per annum. After due consideration, your board decided to take up the manufacture of steam turbines, and arrangements of a satisfactory character have been concluded to make turbines under the Bergmann patents. It is hoped that this departure will be the means of increasing our business in large alternators, for which we have a good reputation. The works have been maintained in a high state of efficiency, and everything is being done to cheapen the cost of production, while maintaining the highest standard of workmanship. If I might respectfully suggest it to the financiers of this country, it would be to their ultimate advantage, as well as to the advantage of our industrial concerns, if they could use their good influence to see that as far as possible the money provided by the British investor was expended as regards material in providing employment for our own people. German and French financial methods are an object-lesson in this respect. I cannot conclude without expressing the directors' thanks to the staff for their zeal in promoting the interests of the company.

The report was unanimously adopted, and the retiring directors and auditors were re-elected.

A vote of thanks to the chairman, the directors, and the staff terminated the proceedings.

NEW UNITED REEFS (SHEBA).

The ordinary general meeting of the New United Reefs (Sheba), Limited, was held on Wednesday last at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., Mr. George T. Rait presiding.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said that at the meeting a year ago he ventured to predict that they would soon place all their share capital, and he was happy to say that that was now an accomplished fact. He was also pleased to say that they now had about 500 shareholders in the company. The money which they had received had been spent on the development work, which was going on steadily; they were free from debt of all kinds, the old debentures being paid off, and from all liabilities. Operations had been confined chiefly to the old mine, the Joe's Luck, and for this reason: that the prospects were so encouraging there that the manager had decided for the present that it would be better to devote all their labour and expenditure on that portion of their property. He did not wish the shareholders to run away with the idea that their other properties, the Bon Accord and the Thomas's, were disappointing in any way; quite the reverse, but they had decided to work the Joe's Luck in the meantime, considering that that was the best way of spending their money. Prospects continued to be exceedingly good. They had cabled out on Friday for the latest news, and the shareholders had all received a copy of the cable which they had received in reply. With regard to prospecting the position was that they were pretty certain now that going down the fissure vein improved. According to the latest assay out there the average was 3 ozs. to the ton. Some months ago they had asked the mine manager to send home a sample of the ordinary ore, not a picked sample. That was from the 25,000 tons of what they called their rich ore, as contrasted with the 350,000 tons of what was known as the poorer stuff. The result of the assay of that sample was expected to reach them any minute, and he wished to warn the shareholders not to imagine, should that sample turn out to be phenomenally rich, that the whole of that 25,000 tons was equally valuable. He thought that it would prove to be very rich indeed, but they had no wish to inflate share values at all. Whatever the result was, it was only done for the sake of getting information. The battery had commenced work on September 12, and was now running satisfactorily. His son had recently returned from a visit to the property and reported that the battery, the aerial ropeway, and everything connected with the plant were in first-class order, and that the mine manager was a most able man. They had got plenty of money to go on with until they got the expected results from crushing. They fully expected that they would begin to receive remittances from the mine at an early date, and that at the next meeting they would be in a position to declare a dividend, the size of which would depend upon the richness of the ore. They were contemplating the formation of a small company to work the Desire claims, in which they had a most valuable asset.

Mr. W. Watkins, in seconding the resolution, said he looked on the future with the greatest confidence.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

MIDLAND RAILWAY OF WESTERN AUSTRALIA, LIMITED.

A meeting of the holders of the 6 per cent. cumulative income debenture stock was held on the 29th ult., at Winchester House, E.C., for the purpose of considering a scheme for the reorganisation of the debenture and share capital. Mr. W. Capel Slaughter (chairman) was voted to the chair.

The Chairman, in moving the formal resolutions, said: My colleagues and I recognise that it is the 6 per cent. debenture stockholders who are most interested in the proposals for the reorganisation of the share and debenture capital. It is very desirable that the capital account should be put upon a very much better and stable basis, because we consider that this constant piling up of arrears of interest upon what is really the chief security of this company is a thing which cannot but be a detrimental factor. A further point is that it is always open for the company at any half-yearly interest date to disregard entirely the question of the arrears of interest upon your stock, and to compel you to accept £100, plus a premium of 15 per cent., in satisfaction of all capital, all arrears of interest, and your premium upon redemption. The capital amount of your stock which is issued is £973,723, and the net revenue cannot be placed at a higher figure than £50,000 a year. On that £50,000 a year there exists to-day a prior charge of £22,300 a year, and that figure is, in respect of the new 4 per cent. first mortgage debenture stock which we propose should be issued to provide funds for redeeming those stocks, likely to be practically unchanged; and, although we talk of issuing £600,000, which would require obviously £24,000 a year to provide for, I may point out that if we do issue that amount, that will provide a sum of £40,000 or £50,000 of working capital, the interest upon which must obviously be deducted in making a comparison between what are the prior charges now existing and those which are projected in our scheme. Assuming the figure to be £23,000 or £24,000, it follows that the balance of revenue would be less than 2½ per cent. upon the capital of £973,000 odd of your stock. The arrears of interest due at June 30, 1910, were £701,080, and apart from the scheme, it cannot be doubted that those arrears of interest must year by year for some time to come be considerably augmented. The share capital is £1,240,000, divided into two classes. There are 200,000 ordinary shares of £6 each, upon which the sum of £1 has been paid, leaving £5 uncalled, the cancellation of which is part and parcel of the scheme which you are asked to sanction to-day. The remainder of the capital is £40,000, in 40,000 founders' shares of £1 each. In return for the sacrifices which you are asked to make you are getting practically 86.66 per cent. of the equity or reversion in the estate and property, and the shareholders get the balance.

Mr. G. V. Shillinglaw, London manager of the National Bank of Australasia, said that, as representing that institution, he would second the resolutions.

The resolutions were carried.

Prior to the meeting above reported there were held an extraordinary general meeting of the company, separate class meetings of ordinary and founders' shareholders, and meetings of the 5 per cent. prior lien and the 5 per cent. cumulative income debenture stockholders, at which resolutions approving the scheme were adopted.

DUFF DEVELOPMENT COMPANY.

The ordinary general meeting of the Duff Development Company, Limited, was held yesterday at Winchester House, Mr. R. W. Duff presiding.

The Chairman said the profit and loss account showed a gross profit from the four dredges of £10,235, which was a small increase. After providing for debenture interest, a balance of £270 remained for transfer to the credit of general profit and loss. This was not a big credit balance, but it was the first one; while there had been an important appreciation in the value of their assets. There was no reason why they should not have good profits from dredging. The plantation rubber was looking very promising, and they were commencing tapping in a fortnight, and with regard to the sawmill they were treating its capacity, and the results should be very satisfactory. Dealing next with the negotiations with the Government, the Chairman said that there seemed to have been a general impression that he went out to Kelantan when the State was about to be taken under British protection for the purpose, among other things, of endeavouring to sell to the Government certain of their rights, more particularly rights of taxation at the highest figure he could exact. He wished to assure the meeting most emphatically that he did not go out to Kelantan for that purpose at all. When he went out he was far from desiring to obtain a high price from the Government for the revenue to which they were entitled. Had he been able to do so with justice to the shareholders he would have advised the company to surrender their revenues without pecuniary consideration at all, but this was impossible, not only because they had been crippled by the cost of maintaining their position, but because they had practically lost nine years of their tenure to the commercial rights by the opposition of the late Government. In the course of the negotiations an offer was made by the Government to the company to purchase a part of its rights at £100,000, but after due consideration this offer was not accepted, and it was decided that the company should retain all its unusual rights, which were very valuable, and that the Government undertook to give their support and co-operation to the company and its work. The Governor authorised him to tell the shareholders he was satisfied that the future prosperity of the State, in his opinion, was largely dependent upon the success of the company, and that they might rely upon his assistance and goodwill in the future. The Chairman then dealt at some length with the various rights which they held, showing how they had appreciated in value, adding that the hopes he had so long expressed of the potential value of the assets under good government were in a fair way to being realised. To justify their position in Kelantan they must adopt a policy of active development, and they had come to the conclusion that they were more than justified in making an issue of debenture stock to the extent of £250,000 at 6 per cent. The security was ample, and they had prepared a prospectus which could be issued shortly. An extraordinary general meeting would be held on the 12th inst. to pass the necessary resolution to increase the share capital by £100,000, which would provide a sufficient number of shares to meet the above rights. The proceeds would be employed first to redeem at £105 per cent. the outstanding balance of £54,730 of existing stock, and they would have left £180,000 for working capital. He hoped he had convinced them that the period of their troubles was over, and concluded by moving the adoption of the report.

Mr. A. G. Morgan seconded the resolution, and it was carried unanimously.

SOUTH-EAST AFRICA, LIMITED.

An extraordinary general meeting was held on the 29th ult. at Salisbury House, London Wall, Dr. Carl Peters in the chair, to consider resolutions for effecting an amalgamation of the company with Deutsche-Ophir-Minen-Gesellschaft M.B.H., and with a view thereto winding up the company voluntarily, and appointing Mr. William Swan, of 31, Mosley Street, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, liquidator; authorising the latter to consent to the registration of a new company, to be named South East Africa (1910), Limited; and approving the draft agreement submitted to the meeting and expressed to be made between the company and its liquidator of the first part, Deutsche-Ophir-Minen-Gesellschaft M.B.H. of the second part, Dr. Carl Peters of the third part, Oskar Wolff of the fourth part, and South East Africa (1910), Limited, of the fifth part.

The Chairman said that the shareholders had before them the scheme of the new company as arranged by the board. From the 700,000 shares of South East Africa (1910), Limited, 172,845 would be allotted to South East Africa or their nominees and 165,000 to Deutsche-Ophir-Minen-Gesellschaft or their nominees. Mr. Oskar Wolff and he had agreed to take fully paid shares at par in the new company in full settlement of cash loans advanced to this company. He (Dr. Peters) was also to receive, besides the settlement of this loan, 30,000 shares for services rendered and to be rendered. In explanation he might say that he had never received any remuneration as chairman of the company. The cash debts of South East Africa, Limited, were £11,422 14s. 11d., which would be covered by the payment of 22,845 shares, leaving a balance out of the 172,845 shares of 150,000, from which each shareholder would be allotted at once one new share for every share held by him in this company. This company further held 428,200m. in the Deutsche-Ophir-Minen-Gesellschaft, for which they would receive in due course 42,820 shares. The directors expected when the liquidation of the Deutsche-Ophir-Minen-Gesellschaft was completed to make a further distribution to the shareholders of about one new share for every four shares held in this company. He thought that the new company would start with excellent prospects. Since their last meeting the development on the East Rand had given further satisfactory results. They had also received further encouraging news from the Penhalonga mine. About their diamond fields in German South-West Africa, Conception Bay, they were there participating in an option to 300 claims, 60 of which had been found carrying diamonds. With reference to Bilkis, the firm of mining engineers holding the option informed them that one of the leading mining engineers residing in Rhodesia was now preparing a report on the property. The registration of the new company was to be effected before November 30, and all the terms of the scheme before the shareholders had already been accepted by the Deutsche-Ophir-Minen-Gesellschaft. He concluded by proposing the resolutions.

Mr. Weinthal seconded, and they were unanimously carried.

NEW CANADIAN ORE SUPPLY.

Particulars of Ore Deposits in Eastern Ontario.

The following statement of the discovery of ore deposits in Eastern Ontario has been communicated for insertion in these columns :—

The news of the discovery of valuable high-grade ore deposits in Eastern Ontario, Canada, near the great centres of population, has created widespread interest, not only in this country, but also amongst the great iron and steel companies of the Dominion. Additional importance is lent to the discovery by the fact that the iron region is traversed by several railways, and is within a distance of only sixty miles following the railroad from the port of Kingston, on Lake Ontario. The ore deposits already proved open up a new source of supply, estimated at 1,000,000 tons annually, for the great Canadian steel works, which have hitherto had to depend almost entirely upon supplies from other countries.

Dr. Robert Bell, F.R.S., for many years head of the Dominion Geological Surveys, who is at present in this country, gives some interesting details of the new ore region, and of its effects upon the steel industry of Canada.

"Up to the present," he says, "Canada has produced very little high-grade iron ore, even although a few large and good deposits have been shown to exist in different parts of the country. We did not know, however, of any deposits sufficiently valuable, and situated near a railroad for transportation, to warrant their having any considerable commercial value.

Location of the New Ranges.

"The location of the new ranges of iron ore, which have recently been discovered, is on the Kingston and Pembroke Railroad, and they also lie so close to Lake Ontario that they become immediately valuable. In fact, the situation of these ranges is far better than any known large deposits at present being mined in the United States. Canada will thus have a very large and independent source for her future supply. I have seen enough of the new iron region to satisfy myself that the various steel and iron plants now operating in Canada and drawing on other countries can easily obtain all their ore supplies from this one range alone when the machinery is in full operation.

"From an Imperial standpoint, therefore, the discovery of this very large high-grade ore bed is of national importance. We know at the present time the Canadian furnaces are securing their ore from other countries and but little from the Canadian fields. The consumption of iron and steel is undoubtedly very heavy in Canada to day, and as the country is growing the consumption is bound to increase very rapidly. At present we have to go a thousand miles east or west for the supplies of ore. Along the Kingston and Pembroke Railroad we have a range of ore bodies situated almost in the middle of the big iron and steel producing plants of Canada, and near all the large centres of population. The ore is of higher grade than anything being mined in the United States.

"In estimating the commercial value of a workable bed of iron ore, three factors have to be considered," Dr. Bell points out. "The first is quantity, which ought to be sufficient to last for years; the second is quality, which should be pure enough for making the highest grade of steel; and the third is the distance to market and the accessibility. The new ore range is just half-way between Montreal and Toronto, and is on a good railroad, which is controlled by the Canadian Pacific. The iron-bearing portion of the Kingston and Pembroke iron ranges would cover a territory of some eighty miles along the railroad. The width, so far, is undetermined, but extends indefinitely to the east and west, easily some twenty miles on either side. The railroad, in fact, runs through the heart of the iron region. I have thoroughly investigated a solid block of 5,670 acres, but the total extent of the property to which I am making more particular reference is altogether 17,000 acres.

Quality of Ore Produced.

"The quality of the ore already produced is the best thing worked in the country. It has been assayed by various Government chemists. One Dr. Hoffmann, former Chief Chemist, says it is splendid ore, and runs about 61 per cent. of metallic iron, and is practically free from phosphorous or sulphur, or any other ingredients which are objectionable to the making of first-class Bessemer steel; and Dr. Leverin, the present Chief Chemist of the Dominion Department of Mines, agrees with him, and finds an even higher percentage of iron.

"Already the work of development is pretty considerable. Several large shafts have already been put down. In one of these shafts following the slope of the bed for 380 ft. the ore is 50 ft. thick, while in another shaft to the north-west it is 60 ft. thick, and a fourth shaft of some 250 ft. is in a third bed of ore about 30 ft. in thickness. In addition, a great many boreholes have been put down, and some open working has been done. Diamond drilling by means of three complete sets of machinery is also progressing. By the work already accomplished, therefore, it has been proved that the ore occurs in three distinct beds, one above the other.

"All these ore bodies are being developed at the present time," Dr. Bell continues, "and are being equipped with up-to-date machinery, so that by November 1 the daily output will be 1,000 tons. The properties are under the supervision of competent managers, and there is now a large force of men actively engaged in the mining of the ore. The development work is progressing, and additional plant is being installed to bring the capacity speedily up to 2,000 tons daily; in other words, in addition to the present plant, a second plant is to be erected at what is known as the vertical shaft, which will have a minimum daily capacity of an additional 1,000 tons.

"'This by no means, however, would indicate the capacity of the output which the mines are capable of furnishing," adds Dr. Bell, "and it would be an easy matter to increase the output considerably. This rich and abundant ore is near the surface, and over such an extent of territory that it can be attacked in many places. With the abundant labour and timber available for mining purposes, and with a water-power capable of furnishing several thousand horse-power, the ores can be mined at very small cost, and, because of close proximity to the markets, will be entitled to very favourable freight rates. I am of the opinion that the large extent of the ore bodies will easily make possible a production of 1,000,000 tons or more annually."

QUEER STORY.

A NIGHT OF HORROR.

"WELL, you will have a nice quiet evening, dear," said Celia. "You'll be quite alone. It's cook's evening out, and Taylor has gone to see her aunt—she's ill, and I promised James last week that he should go to the magic-lantern entertainment at St. John's school-room. I'd have kept him in if I'd known you weren't coming with me."

James is the smart boy who cleans boots and knives, waits at table, and falls down stairs.

Celia looked radiant as she came into the drawing-room; for certain touches added since dinner completed the picture.

"Though I do wish you were coming with me," she continued, as she impaled a button with a needle and began sewing it on to the glove that dangled from her wrist. "You always enjoy 'at homes' when you are there."

"I want to work," I said. "I've got an idea, and I only get an idea once in every six weeks. It doesn't do to miss an idea."

"Well, you had better work here," said Celia.

"There's a lovely fire, and it's much more comfortable than upstairs in your study; and there's no one to bother you. You got me a hansom, didn't you?"

"It's been waiting at the gate for a quarter of an hour. That will be sixpence extra," I said.

"What a nuisance buttons are!" said Celia, biting off the thread and sticking the needle into the corner of the mantelpiece. "Now I'm ready. Do a nice lot of work. I shall be home before twelve."

I put Celia into her hansom and returned to the house. It felt very empty indeed. Owing to the absence of Taylor, or the magic-lantern entertainment of James, there was very little light in the hall; but the drawing-room was cheerful enough, and my spirits rose at the prospect of two hours' uninterrupted work.

For a few minutes I walked to and fro, grappling with my idea, and trying to get it well under control, when I heard—or, rather, I was dimly conscious of—a movement behind me. Only an indefinite stirring of something in the room, but as I stopped and turned, I was absolutely certain that something had moved.

A mouse?

I am not afraid of mice, but I cannot write while mice are playing about my feet. So I whistled to Ah Sin—Ah Sin is Celia's pet chow-chow—who was asleep upon the hearthrug. Ah Sin rose slowly, wagged his tail, and, seeing nothing to eat, turned twice round and lay down again.

The merest trifle will put me off work. But I was determined that this evening at least should not be wasted, and began busying myself in setting a table near the fire and arranging my chair so that the lamplight should fall over my left shoulder. While thus occupied I again heard a vague rustle behind me, and in the next instant I had turned my head and was looking intently in the direction whence the sound came. And as I turned there was another hurried movement from the corner of the room to the left of the fireplace; then all was still. Everything was as it had been, and the corner was occupied only by a large, circular brass tray, resting on an Indian stand, which Celia had picked up in the King's Road for a mere song the week before.

"I must be a little nervous," I said to myself. "Certainly the house does feel a bit lonely."

Again I addressed my mind firmly to thoughts of work. I had my idea ready; I had light, warmth, solitude, a chair, and a table. Nothing more was needed but paper, ink, and pen. But these were upstairs in my study. I had crossed the dimly lighted hall, and had my foot upon the first stair, when I heard a curious rhythmical tapping in the room I had just left. In a moment I was at the door of the drawing-room again. Everything was perfectly quiet. Ah Sin upon the hearthrug opened an eye of inquiry at my sudden return, gave one wag of the tail, and went to sleep again.

"This is ridiculous," I said; "I am not going to be put off my work if all the spirits in creation choose to rap their knuckles raw."

And I went upstairs whistling. But my whistling did not quite drown the mysterious sound from the drawing-room, which began again as soon as my back was turned.

Having found what I wanted in my room, I came stumbling downstairs again in the dark. The sound of tapping had ceased, and all was quiet. With my writing materials set out before me, and my chair in a convenient position for the light, I proceeded to gather together my thoughts. Everything was in favour of meditation. Absolute quiet pervaded the house, a quiet broken only now and again by the tinkle of a hansom passing down the road at the end of the garden. And yet I was curiously restless. Try as I would to concentrate my thoughts, I was distracted by the feeling that something—somewhere in the room—was uneasy. I wrote a dozen words, and found that I had used the same word twice, and was morally bound to use it again in two lines. That is an irritating experience, but by no means uncommon. So I scratched out what I had written and shifted my chair—for luck.

There again was that faint stirring of some inexplicable presence.

"That's the worst of being alone in an empty house at night," I muttered. "You fancy all kinds of things. Now, I'm quite sure nothing has moved but myself." And I settled myself in my chair to face my work. Nevertheless, something did move—over in that corner by the fireplace, where I could just see by glancing obliquely from the sheet of paper before me.

"Movement is the law of Nature," I murmured to myself, and stuck doggedly at the throat of my opening sentence, looking for suggestion at every corner of the room but that corner by the fireplace. And then, as the sentence lay stretched out and submissive before me, and I bent forward to write it, came three distinct and decided taps upon the brass tray. I looked up. There was nothing to be seen. But the sentence had gone and I had to make a new one. I ruffled my hair, unbuttoned my waistcoat, and threw two ruined sheets of paper into the fire, while that ridiculous noise recurred at intervals; but I kept my eyes with grim determination away from the corner whence it came. At last I could stand it no longer. I am by no means ill-tempered, but this disturbance was too bad.

"I'll pitch that infernal tray into the garden," I said, jumping up from my chair; "it can make as much noise as it pleases there."

But as I jumped up there was another quick movement—a movement, as it seemed, without an object moving—from the corner, and I distinctly heard the brushing of a light footstep across the floor. Ah Sin heard it too. He leaped up from the hearthrug and stood growling with all the hair down the middle of his back standing on end.

I am not superstitious, but as I stood there, stock still, with the dog growling at something I could not see but only hear, I was distinctly upset. Not afraid, you will understand—annoyed.

Very quietly, and with perfect deliberation, I walked round and round the room, peering carefully into every corner, for I was very short-sighted. Of course, there was nothing to be found. Really, I did not expect to find anything. I merely wanted to assure myself that there was nothing in the room which ought not to be there. On the brass tray—which I decided to stand in disgrace against the wall in the corner—there was only a box of cigarettes and a piece of needlework which Celia had left. Nothing in the room was out of place. But just as I was turning away from one of Celia's screens, behind which I had looked for the second time—there could be no mistake—I heard a swift rustle at my back. Ah Sin dashed forward to the screen, then stopped short, snarling, and showing every tooth in his head.

There must be something unusual in the room.

For fully a minute I stood still where I had stopped upon hearing the rustle for the last time. Ah Sin retired, growling, to the hearth-rug. The silence of the house was oppressive. It was not until the postman's double knock sounded upon the door in the lane running behind the house that I drew a long breath, and realised that for some time I had scarcely breathed at all. The proximity of the postman consoled me with the thought that I was not quite alone in the world with—whatever that rustling was; and I decided to go down to the back door and get the letters; then I would settle down to work.

"I'll turn up the gas in the hall," I said to myself. "That will make things a little less dreary."

It is always easier to turn the gas out than to turn it up, so I turned it out.

There were no matches in the drawing-room, and I had to go twice round the hall groping for the match-box, which is never in its proper place, and knocking over a chair in my passage. And all the time I knew—I knew—that a footstep was following me—a footstep that made but the ghost of a sound upon the rugs with which the floor of the hall is covered. More than once I turned and walked backwards, stopping suddenly and putting out my hands to convince myself that there was nothing there. I felt nothing, I saw nothing. Only I knew it was there.

When at last I found the matches, my hand, I could not help noticing, was trembling, as I climbed on one of the hall chairs and lighted the gas lamp. It is one of those lamps which aim, rather, at concealing than at giving light; but it served to show that I was quite alone, so far as my eyes could see. In the middle of the hall stood a small oak table; on it a tray containing a whisky decanter, tumblers, and a soda-water siphon. Three times I walked round the hall, just to make sure that there was no one in it but myself, and yet, when I stood at the head of the stairs which led down to the basement and the back door, I was as convinced as ever that there was something moving about which had no right to be moving about. Ah Sin seemed uneasy, too, for he appeared at the drawing-room door and looked suspiciously round the hall, and then stood with his eyes fixed on me, without wagging his tail.

"What folly!" I said aloud. "Come along, Ah Sin; we'll go down and get the letters, and then set to work seriously; I've had enough of this nonsense."

Ah Sin came nose down across the hall, and I began to descend the stairs, not without sundry glances over my shoulder. At the fifth step I stopped short; so did my heart; for, beyond all doubt, there was a footstep behind me, a quiet pit-pat which certainly was not due to imagination. I could count the footfalls. Turning my head slowly, I saw Ah Sin at the top of the stairs looking intently after me, his back bristling. I started again and descended, turning round at each step as I went, for I could not endure those footfalls behind me. And then, to my horror, I saw Ah Sin dash down the stairs and snap wildly at the sounds of the footsteps that were made by no visible feet. The perspiration broke out all over me, and I think I must have lost my head.

"What the devil are you?" I called out, and turned to rush headlong down the stairs to the door—and the air—and the open street.

But at that moment I felt myself seized about the ankles by some unseen force. I stumbled and fell. I heard a terrific crash upon the floor above; I heard Ah Sin bark once, and then I remembered no more.

It was a thousand years or so after that—so it seemed to me at the time—that I opened my eyes and found myself lying in the dimly lighted basement with a very bad headache and Ah Sin regarding me critically. After another hundred years or so I sat up and rubbed my head where it hurt most.

"Ah Sin!" I said.

He advanced and offered me something which he held in his mouth, looking relieved when I accepted it. It seemed to be a reel of cotton. As I turned it in my hand I noticed that it was unwound, and passing my other hand vaguely along the loose thread I followed it to my ankle. Somehow I was glad.

Celia opened the hall door at about half-past eleven.

"Good gracious!" she said. "What are you doing? And what an awful smell of whisky!"

"Don't move," I said. "The whole house is a network of cotton-thread."

"What do you mean?" said Celia. "And has James smashed all the glass in the house?"

For James, returned betimes from the magic-lantern entertainment, was in the middle of a sodden heap of broken glass with a dustpan. I was laboriously cutting myself loose with a penknife.

"Celia," I said, "I wish you would keep your reels of cotton under proper control. This accursed reel of cotton has been dodging my footsteps the whole evening, ruined my work, wasted the whisky——"

"Cotton!" said Celia; "why, it's silk. And there's hardly a bit left."

"Oh, there's plenty!" I said. "It's all over the house. When you want a bit just put out your hand, and you'll find some."

BOOKS.

MR. RAFAEL SHAW'S "Spain from Within" (1) is the most opportune of books, supplying, as it does, the key to the present political position in Spain, though the work was written before the crisis of the moment arose. Mr. Shaw expresses the views of the Spanish peasant and artisan collected with the most painstaking and sympathetic zeal here, there, and everywhere in town and country, and presents them to you usually in the very words of these working folk themselves. These views, or perhaps I might even say this view, is that the Jesuits are at the bottom of everything that is wrong and rotten in the State.

> Who makes the penny loaf and Chartists rise?
> Who fills the butchers' shops with large blue flies?

The Jesuits. "I sometimes think," said Heine, "that the Jesuits only exist as long as we believe in them," and no doubt their power for evil even in Spain is exaggerated. But how account for the intense hatred of the Spanish working class, townsman and peasant alike, for the Jesuits, for the religious orders, and for the priests? Their very ignorance, you would say—and seventy per cent. of the population can neither read nor write—would leave them at the mercy of priestcraft; yet in Spain it is the educated (if, indeed, any class in that country can be called educated) who are priest-ridden. But, in the first place, the memory of the frightful tyranny of the Inquisition is still keen in Spain; in the second place, the religious orders have abused abominably their trade and other privileges, while what Lecky said of mediæval religion is still true of that country: "It is no exaggeration to say that to give money to the priests was for several centuries the first article of the moral code"; and, in the third place, both the priests and the religious orders are on the side of oppression, wrong, and robbery. Whatever the causes of this intense and almost universal detestation by the working class in Spain of monks, priests, and nuns, there it is, a fact to be reckoned with, and the reckoning does not now seem to be far off. The causes assigned by the priests themselves—the anarchy and atheism of the working class—do not exist. There are few anarchists in Spain and yet fewer atheists. On the contrary, the people, as indeed you might expect from their ignorance, are extraordinarily superstitious. "There is no room for doubt that the mass of the people love God, Christ, the Virgin, and the saints with a warmth and sincerity rare in these materialistic days." They are so superstitious indeed that they worship the images of different Christs and of different Virgins as being themselves distinct personalities. Mr. Shaw, e.g., has been again and again pitied by kindly peasants for having only one Christ. "We," they said, "have many; there is Christ of the Descent from the Cross, and the Christ of the Waters, and the Christ of the Flagellation, all very miraculous." Again, a bright, clever woman of the working class told him that she could only pray to a certain Christ. "All the others are only sticks to me; but I can never pass our Lord of Pity without kneeling down, and I know by the look in His eyes if He is going to grant my prayer; but I cannot pray to any of the others." Even men who "scoff at those fooleries in daily life" will risk their lives to save their favourite image from destruction in any one of those frequent fires which occur owing to the santos being clothed in inflammable lace, etc., and to their having lights burning always before them. On the other hand, neither men nor even women of the working class, speaking generally, go to confession, in part through disgust at the questions asked in the confessional, and in part because the belief is universal that the priest violates its seal—denouncing to mistresses or to magistrates the sins of servants or of criminals which they had revealed to him as penitents. Indeed, the only sacrament of universal acceptance in Spain is that of Baptism, and this for an odd reason—the dread of having their children classed with their old enemies, the Moors. They will scrape together somehow the fee of six shillings demanded for the rite by the priest because otherwise the child would be a Moor! Yet there can be little doubt that the social function, which follows on the rite of baptism, and is peculiar to Spanish Christians, is simply a form of the old Moorish birth-feast. Here then is an extraordinary paradox to be accounted for—a people childishly superstitious and ignorant, and yet the reverse of priest-ridden. It can be adequately accounted for only by the abuse of their secular privileges by the religious orders and of their spiritual power by the priests till they have not only lost the reverence but incurred the scorn and hatred of the people. It was a saying, I think, of James I., "No priest; no king;" but in contemporary Spain by another odd paradox, the unpopularity of the priesthood makes for the popularity of Alfonso XIII., whose heretic marriage to an English princess even was welcomed as anti-Jesuitical. Conversely the Ultramontane Maura Ministry were so Carlist—for Carlism is far from dead in the country—that they censored every favourable press notice of the king and queen, and suppressed even the sale of their photographs! Mr. Shaw's book suggests that the king would have the people almost solid at his back in any attempt of his to reform the desperate state of the country. Corruption there is universal, taxation crushing, while both popular representation and popular education are a mockery and delusion. "The history of Spain," says Mr. Shaw, "for the last three hundred years affords an illustration of the proposition established by Lecky that 'the period of Catholic ascendency was on the whole one of the most deplorable in the history of the human mind.'" As this most opportune and interesting book is sure to go through many editions, it is as well to call attention to such misprints as "badly" for "baldly," p 32, and "balked" for "bulked," p. 206.

Mr. Stebbing's "Jungle By-ways in India" ([2]) is the most interesting of all kinds of works on sport, since the naturalist is as much in evidence as the sportsman, while each has had the advantage of a wonderful field for his activities. Sixteen years in the Indian Forest Service have given Mr. Stebbing his opportunities of sport and observation, and this vivid record of his varied experiences will give the forest "griffin" a fine start in his race, whether as naturalist or sportsman. By the way, Mr. Stebbing tells a good story of the first sporting experience of a "griffin" (who had been a schoolfellow of his) when he joined the Indian Civil Service. As he was a raw lad, armed only with an out-of-date volunteer rifle, he was naturally relegated to the safest spot on a Christmas beat for a tiger, and ordered on no provocation whatsoever to discharge his piece at any other game than "stripes." Nevertheless, his rifle was discharged again and again, to the frenzied fury of the field, who swooped down upon him in a body, turning the air blue with their blasphemy. "What the —— do you mean, sir, spoiling the whole shoot with your —— fusillade?" spluttered the senior officer. "I—I—thought I was free to fire at tigers, sir," stammered the terrified "griffin," "and there were three, and—and I got them, sir. They are down there, sir, in the grass." And, sure enough, down there in the grass were three full-grown tigers, dead!

When you have read Sir Claude Champion De Crespigny's "Forty Years of a Sportsman's Life" ([3]) you will be inclined to apply to him an adaptation of Johnson's epitaph on Goldsmith: "There's hardly any kind of sport which he has not attempted, and in all that he attempted he has excelled." Steeplechasing is no doubt his forte, but sport of all other kinds, from scouting and fighting, lion-shooting and pig-sticking, down to ballooning, yachting, swimming, and boxing, are his foibles. His is a really wonderful record, and he will probably round it off, in spite of his three-score and six years, with some aeroplaning flight and feat! Sir Claude in thinking the younger generation degenerate must certainly except his own sons. Here is an adventure of his fourth son, who is no whit more adventurous than his brothers. When he rode up to a lioness, his horse, terrified by her roar, bolted; its saddle slipped round and the rider fell, and was dragged along a considerable distance through one foot sticking in the stirrup. "However, his foot came out in the nick of time, just as the lioness sprang at him, and he was able to roll her over about fifteen yards off."

Mr. Viereck's "Confessions of a Barbarian" ([4]) is barbarous chiefly in its style. Its short, sharp staccato sentences get at last upon your nerves till you are inclined to fling the book down. In an ordinary book there is no more effective form of emphasis than the sudden pull up of a short sentence. It is like your companion in a walk stopping suddenly to tell or show you something; but if your companion stops you at every other step you are impatient at being pulled up so often and disgusted at being pulled up for nothing. Yet the essays, though far from being as clever as their author assumes them to be, are well worth reading. You are rather artfully than artistically put on the wrong scent in Miss Sophie Cole's "Blue Grey Magic" ([5]); but the effects both of the illusion caused by the blue grey magic and of the subsequent shocking disillusionment are described to the life with a power which holds you absorbed up to the comparatively prosaic close of this fine novel. Mr. Harold Bindloss's "Rancher Carteret" ([6]) is interesting chiefly for its vividly described ranching and mining scenes. As a novel the plot is trite and the leading characters conventional.

The title of Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence's book "Bacon is Shakespeare" (Gay and Hancock, price 2s. 6d. net) reminds one of the navvy's method of controversy—"I'm not arguing, I'm telling you." Sir Edwin writes throughout in the same dogmatic spirit. He is certain that Shakespeare's plays were written by Francis Bacon, and of course, if you are content to accept his judgment as conclusive, there is an end of the matter. On the other hand, if you want something more convincing than the ipse dixit of Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, if you are looking for real evidence rather than for mere unproved statements or grotesquely ridiculous suppositions, then this volume is scarcely likely to persuade you that Bacon is Shakespeare.

A biography of John Brown, who, as the leader of the attack upon Harper's Ferry, played so thrilling a part in the anti-slavery movement in America, is announced for publication at an early date by Messrs. Constable. The author, Mr. Villard, one of the editors of the New York Evening Post, has endeavoured to make his narrative accurate by the examination and in many cases inclusion of original documents, contemporary letters, and the testimony of surviving witnesses. The book is illustrated with photographs, views, maps, and a specimen of facsimile writing from John Brown's last prophecy.

Commander Hamilton Currey, R.N., has written a book entitled "Sea Wolves of the Mediterranean," which will be brought out this month by Mr. Murray. In this connection it is interesting to note that the two battleships just sold by Germany to the Turkish Government are to be named the "Kheyr-ed-din Barbarossa" and the "Drajut Reio." These are the names of two of the most famous of the corsairs of the Mediterranean, whose exploits and adventures are related by Commander Hamilton Currey.

An exhaustive study of Lord Bacon by Dr. G. Walter Steeves is being published this week by Messrs. Methuen. It is a work of biography—not, thank goodness, another contribution to the tiresome Bacon-Shakespeare controversy.

Not a few books concerned with Uganda and British East Africa from the points of view of the naturalist, the big-game hunter, the colonist, and the missionary have been published during the past few years. In "Uganda For a Holiday," which Messrs. Smith, Elder and Company will issue next week, the country is regarded from the outlook of the unspecialised traveller, the man who merely seeks "somewhere to go." The author is Sir Frederick Treves, who has already, since his retirement from the practice of his profession, given us more than one delightful travel book.

Mr. Herbert Ward, whose book dealing with the natives of the Congo is being published by Mr. Heinemann, was placed in command of one of the sections of Stanley's expedition, and spent five years on the Congo, where he studied the people with intentness. Mr. Ward is one of the two English sculptors whose work is exhibited in the Luxembourg Museum, Paris, and the illustrations which accompany the text of his book are largely from his own drawings and bronzes.

There have been several guesses as to the authorship of a little shilling volume of essays entitled "Pause," which many readers have found strangely impressive. It was ascribed to Mr. Guy Thorne, who is also Mr. Ranger Gull, but he denied the soft impeachment, and other attempts to identify the writer have been equally wide of the mark. Messrs. Greening have now made it known that "Pause" is from the pen of Mr. George Robey, the popular comedian—about the last person of whom one would have thought in this connection.

In celebration of its fiftieth year, Public Opinion publishes this week a number of special articles on the progress and changes of the last half-century. The writers include Sir Oliver Lodge, Dr. J. Holland Rose, Mr. Richard Whiteing, Mr. J. A. Hobson, and Mr. Walter Crane. In regard to journalism, Mr. Whiteing observes that the public demand nowadays is for news, for the statement of fact (or for what passes as such) as distinct from the statement of opinion. This is mainly true. Still, there remains quite a considerable body of newspaper readers desiring different fare from that served up by the news editors of the halfpenny Press, and Public Opinion, under the direction of Mr. Percy L. Parker, has come into increased favour as a careful review of the thought and movement of the day.

"A Passion of the South," by Alphonse Daudet (the translation being by Mr. Henry Blanchamp), is the latest addition to Messrs. Greening's dainty little Lotus Library series.

After a silence of nearly three years since the publication of his last book, "Kate Meredith," Mr. C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne has a new novel, "Empire of the World," appearing with Messrs. Everett and Co. The story is concerned with the discovery of a "new force" by which the whole world is affected and the current of existence changed.

ART.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

IT wants a good deal of courage to be a landscape-painter—at least if landscape-painting is to be your sole means of subsistence. The best that can be said for it is that it is hygienic; the worst that it forms the most certain of all the more genteel methods of starvation. Now there is no real merit in starvation unless you happen to be a really bad painter. It is therefore a question worthy of consideration whether it is not better to settle down to an institution of good mediocrity than to die of unachieved originality for a posthumous glory that may never come.

The autumn exhibition of the Society of British Artists is a notable example of the good solid work that can be produced by an institution of which half the members individually would fail to make great impression. Since Sir Alfred East, following a sound instinct, turned it to all intents and purposes into a landscape show, the standard has risen considerably, and while no bright particular star shines above all the others, a large number of the members offer good proof that smaller stars also have their uses. A high standard in an institution might indeed be taken as one of the healthiest signs in art. Raphael and Rubens, while endowing the world, did, I suppose, incalculable harm to their contemporaries and imitators whom they blinded with their light. In a school of painters, on the other hand, each individual lends weight to every other individual. Moronobu alone—or even with Haronobu—could scarcely have lent to the colour-print the far-reaching effect that it attained at the hands of a large number of less original artists. Cozens, Sandby, Payne, Girtin taken separately lose half their meaning. In the same way the Society of British Artists must be taken as a whole, and a very homogeneous whole, for the full realisation of its merit.

Sir Alfred East's "English Manor" is a characteristic piece of work, if savouring somewhat of a "tour de force." The painter has turned the leaves behind which the old house shelters to excellent account, and they lend the picture that decorative effect that he brought back from Japan. Whether he has adopted the best way of treating his subject may be doubted from its very brilliance. It is true that it is thoroughly English, and to a certain extent in the same sense that Constable was English. But it lacks the satisfaction of repose; nor can I imagine looking at it more than once a week with complete complacency. Sir Alfred's decorative supremacy has been challenged by Mr. Alfred Hartley in his "Glade: Decorative Landscape." The tall elms, and rolling clouds, the mists rising widely from the meadows are delightful in suggestion, and show the admirable use to which Mr. Hartley puts the Japanese method of mist-suggestion.

Fulness and emptiness have long represented two opposing artistic ideals. The maxim that painting is the art of leaving out has been perhaps, on the whole, the more dangerous, since it offers greater opportunities to the person who couldn't put in, an he would. Space and emptiness are after all two very different things, the one implying sheer self-restraint, the other an excuse for incompetency. Mr. Murray's "Sapphire Noon" is essentially spacious, and betrays no lack of finish. Its heavy luminousness lends it an admirable suggestion of heat, and makes it one of the best things he has done. Mr. Foweraker belongs to the school of putting in. His "Albi" is a fine piece of painting, carefully detailed, but with complete subordination to the whole. The different planes of distance show a thorough mastery of aerial perspective. Mr. Hely Smith's "Swirling Waters," if not very original, is pleasantly wet, while Mr. Muirhead's "Scottish Moss Troopers" is a bold and successful return to the much despised subject picture. I noticed also Mr. Louis Weirter's London studies, in particular one of the entrance to St. Paul's. Mr. Weirter's fascination by London proves that his country is not without honour among her own prophets.

Almost negligible both in number and quality, a number of portraits effect a compromise with true portraiture by appearing as portrait interiors. Mr. Joseph Simpson's "White Room" has a transient brilliancy which makes the visitor realise poignantly how great a price can be paid for this quality. "The White Room" appears like a flash; it hardly bears looking at for more than an instant before it escapes you. It is an open question whether any picture should be productive of quite so much hard labour on the part of the onlooker, or whether it should not lighten his struggles to see the world more clearly. Mr. Denys Wells' interiors are modelled more or less on those of Mr. Shepherd without improving on them, in most cases without reaching their point of excellence. Mr. Palin's "Lady in a Grey Hat" is suggestive rather of just how much the painter can achieve than of what he has actually achieved.

It might be fairly said of the present exhibition that the man who likes pictures but makes a point of admitting that he knows nothing at all about them, would not go very wrong either with regard to picture or to price at the R.B.A. The sensible habit, moreover, of marking the prices in "plain figures" should offer the final incentive to the hesitating purchaser to support a solid and excellent exhibition.

MUSIC.

THE BEECHAM SEASON.

MR. BEECHAM opened his second season at Covent Garden on Monday, and the musical public will note with no little interest between now and Christmas the result of his operations. Little more than six months ago he made his first essay on similar lines, and no one who follows musical affairs will need to be reminded of the sensational success which he achieved by the production of Strauss's "Elektra." This time his season is to run for three months instead of six weeks, in the course of which he proposes to perform something like forty works representative of every school and period. Mozart's "Magic Flute" and Holbrooke's "Dylan," Beethoven's "Fidelio" and Clutsam's "Summer Night," "Les Troyens" and "Madama Butterfly," "Il Seraglio" and "Le Chemineau," "Ivanhoe" and "Salome," "Tales of Hoffmann" and "Tristan und Isolde," "Don Giovanni" and "Hänsel und Gretel"—these are only some of the works included in this comprehensive scheme, which it would be hardly going too far to describe as the most ambitious ever projected by an operatic manager in London, or, for that matter, anywhere else. If Mr. Beecham only succeeds in producing half of the works which he has announced he will have achieved a remarkable feat. But there is no reason to suppose that he will not give us the greater number of them, for not the least distinctive characteristic of this most spirited entrepreneur is his knack of doing what he promises, even when by all ordinary computations the feat might be reckoned an impossibility. This was so in the case of his former season at Covent Garden; it was so in the case of his summer season at His Majesty's; and there is no reason to doubt that it will prove to be the case once more in connection with his season now opening.

I suppose that hardly any conceivable undertaking in the entertainment line can be reckoned more arduous than that of running such an opera season as that projected in this case. With every advantage of an established opera house, a permanent staff, and a permanent company, to say nothing of a permanent public, it would be an undertaking to intimidate the most intrepid. It is literally the truth that there is not another opera house in any part of the world, whether subsidised or not, which offers its supporters in any one season anything like such a list of works in respect of variety and scope as that which Mr. Beecham has announced. Yet, marvellous to relate, Mr. Beecham comes to his task not as the head of an established organisation with years of experience behind it, but as one who has only recently taken up the work himself, acting in conjunction with a company brought together from all quarters, and containing at least a considerable proportion of artists who are themselves more or less novices at the game. Really it is calculated to make some of the old greybeards directing the destinies of famous Continental opera houses shudder to reflect on such audacity.

The only element of doubt about the undertaking relates not to its artistic side but to its commercial prospects, as to which it is not Mr. Beecham but the public which has the last word. It would be exceedingly interesting to ascertain, if it were possible, how many of all London's millions are even aware at present of the existence of any such undertaking being under way at all. The truth, if we could learn it, would probably be startling. I should not be surprised to find that there were thousands even among professed music lovers who have not at present tumbled to the fact at all. So many and diverse are London's interests and distractions, and so limited is that section of the public to which grand opera makes any particular appeal. Mr. Hammerstein, it is true, has recently been expressing the belief that our needs are not yet adequately supplied in this respect, but I fear that the experience of those who are in a position to speak more authoritatively than he is on the subject at present would hardly bear out that suggestion. Still, if in the ordinary way demand creates supply, it is doubtless true that in some cases the opposite principle obtains, and that then supply creates demand, and it is on this principle, I imagine, that Mr. Beecham is working. Grand opera flourishes, more or less, in every other country in the world. Why, therefore, should it not do the like here? London supports at the present time thirty West End theatres, as many again in the suburbs, and upwards of sixty music halls. Is it unreasonable to suppose that there is room among all these for just one opera house? One would hardly think so. Yet past experience bearing on the subject can hardly be reckoned too encouraging.

The Promenades were last week again the only important concerts engaging attention, and many interesting works were heard, though none calling for prolonged consideration. Schubert's great symphony in C was welcome on Wednesday, and Mr. Wood may have been interested to notice on Thursday that, according to one of his critics, "there is no work of which he gives a more complete and satisfying interpretation"; while, according to another, "it is not very well suited to the idiosyncrasies of his temperament." Some excerpts from Mr. Norman O'Neill's "Blue Bird" music made very pleasant hearing on another evening; while Dr. Walford Davies's fine "Festal Overture" was repeated on Saturday. On Saturday afternoon Mr. Backhaus had a large audience for his piano recital, and played with unfailing neatness, as usual. This week several concerts of interest are being given, including Kubelik's recital to-morrow (Thursday) and that of Ysaye on Saturday.

On the question of key characteristics a correspondent writes:—

> Your article is right in one way and wrong in another. A note of any pitch may be called C, and from it flow C major and A minor alike, no matter what the pitch of the C. But a musical ear does not hear the actual notes played on our equal-tempered keyed instruments—does not hear them as they are played. The musical ear hears them as they really should be if played on instruments that sound the real scale (e.g., horns). Even this does not matter as long as the music continues in the key it begins with. But the moment that a modulation occurs things alter. The correct ear has corrected the faulty temperament of the original key. And it also corrects the faulty temperament of the modulation. So a modulation from C into G (one sharp), with the original succession of notes repeated, sounds quite unlike a modulation from C into F (one flat). For example, C D E F G A B C is a melody (?). Follow it by G A B C D E F sharp G you get a rousing effect. Play it again and follow it with F G A B flat C D E F you get a depressing effect.

I am not sure that I quite follow my correspondent in what he says as to the ear correcting faulty temperament, and in any case I do not see how this bears on the question of individual keys possessing specific characteristics. No one denies that a modulation from C to G produces a different effect from a modulation from C to F; the point under discussion, however, is not this at all, but whether the scale of C, played separately, differs in any respect from the scale of G, say, played separately, or any other, and on this point the letter above quoted does not seem to throw any light at all.

I like the breezy tone of that honest Briton who has recently been asking the Daily Mail, in indignant accents, "Are we going to submit to the foreign composer for ever?" "The time is ripe," he continues, with an eloquence which recks not of grammar or construction, "for British composers to awake and stamp Britain yet—not only as the first sea Power, but in that art which is the most beautiful of all." Here is the right spirit. This is the sort of thing which has made us what we are. "A British work," a British title, and a British composer," cries the patriotic one in clarion tones, "these are the essentials." But are they? The plague of it is that these "foreign devils" will persist in writing better works than we can, and that a miserably unpatriotic British public gives them the preference in consequence. However, let us hope for the best, and trust that it really is the fact that "the time is ripe for British composers to awake and stamp." Our friend of the Daily Mail has, at any rate, given them a friendly lead.

THE THEATRES.

"D'Arcy of the Guards," at the St. James's.

BY this time I should imagine that Mr. Alexander is a little tired of being told that his new production is hardly worthy of the traditions of the St. James's management, and it is unfortunate that the statement should be so painfully true. "D'Arcy of the Guards" belongs, in fact, to the innocuous drama. It is childishly simple and naive, and Mr. Louis Evan Shipman's picture of the goings on of British officers in Philadelphia in 1777-8 would, if true, easily explain why we lost America. Dear, simple souls are these gaily uniformed creatures, good at love-making, fighting duels, singing songs, and drinking punch, but incredibly careless in all matters relating to the business of war. It is the gay uniforms and the pretty scenes that are the most attractive features in the entertainment, for whatever their faults of negligence these officers are splendidly turned out. Accordingly there is every excuse for pretty Pamela Townshend falling in love with her country's enemy, Captain and Colonel the Hon. John D'Arcy—that gay dog of an Irishman who has made love to every pretty woman he has met, but has never been hard hit until now. It was this part, I suppose, that attracted Mr. Alexander, for so many people are apt to think that a showy part makes a good play, but not all his skill or his beautiful uniform or his nicely suggested brogue can make D'Arcy anything but rather a poor creature who is far too ready to neglect his country's interests for love making. In point of fact, the author has served Mr. Alexander very badly. The little romance is all too obvious; how often have we not seen a soldier falling in love with the daughter of the people on whom he is making war; and so the trite story is filled out with every obvious theatrical device until, in the end, Pamela having shot her enemy-hero and then nursed him back to health falls into his unwounded arm, and the importance of the American War of Independence is snuffed out by love making. Miss Evelyn D'Alroy is very charming, and looks as pretty as a picture as the rebel maid, but she ought to know more about dressing wounds than to bandage D'Arcy's wounded arm with a piece of red silk tied outside his red coat. Linen next the skin is safer if you want to avoid blood poisoning. Moreover, as the gallant captain has been badly hit in the arm and chest, I thought that Mr. J. H. Barnes, otherwise Dr. Gregory, might have had sufficient perspicacity to observe that his friend was suffering from something more than a glass too much punch. However, none of these things matter much in a romantic comedy which is remote from realism, and only suggests a series of pretty coloured pictures.

"Young Fernald," at the New Theatre.

Young Fernald wrote a remarkable historical book, and Mr. Norman McKinnel, himself an eminent historian and in danger of losing his eyesight, said to himself: "The author of this book is just the sort of chap that I should like to have as my secretary." Accordingly he made inquiries, and finding that Young Fernald was exceedingly poor and anxious for work engaged "him" on the spot. And then Miss Millard turned up at his house on a lonely Yorkshire moor—Miss Millard, a radiant creature in a red cloak—and said "I am Young Fernald, Carey Fernald, your new secretary." Of course, many men would have been delighted, but Mr. McKinnel disliked women. As his ideas of the sex were doubtless founded on his own womenkind he had every excuse for this attitude. He had just been suffering severely at the hands of his brother's young wife, a wayward, tearful terror who tidied up his study and burned his most valuable papers and typified the sex in its most maddening aspect. It is always a comfort, though, to reflect that however trying women may be in real life they are never quite as foolish as they are sometimes represented to be on the stage. However, Mr. McKinnel, having no belief in women, ridiculed Miss Millard's claim that she could play a man's game, and that her sex need be no barrier, and was so aggressively rude to her that she left his house in a temper, determined to find her way back to the station through a violent snowstorm. She started off, and in a very little while Mr. McKinnel and his young brother, who were both anxious about her safety, went off in different directions to rescue her. Well, that is not quite what happened. It was sturdy Miss Millard who rescued the young brother from a snow drift into which he had fallen and sprained his ankle. After that the historian feels that he has been hard on Young Fernald, and so when the moon comes out, and when on comparing notes they both discover that the moon inspires them, they sit up all night working on Mr. McKinnel's epoch-making book. I could not help thinking this a brutally severe test to which to subject a young woman on the first night of her arrival, but Miss Millard comes through it admirably, though the morning finds her sleeping by the fire utterly worn out. It is then that the historian's womenkind find her, and they are horrified. With stage unanimity they decide that there is nothing to be done but for Mr. McKinnel to make an honest woman of her. On the stage people always instantly imagine "the worst," and you can imagine which is the more wroth, the historian or his new secretary. There are many minor difficulties about women playing the man's game. In the first place, other women won't let them. In the second place, the man they are playing it with is pretty sure to break the rules. In the third place, the woman soon gets sick of it, and is very annoyed if the man does not break the rules, and so Young Fernald again leaves the house, once more in a rage. This strange couple meet next in a railway station, where Mr. McKinnel plays the man's game and Miss Millard is quite content to play the woman's game, and all is well. They will collaborate historically and otherwise in the future. Though frankly farcical in places the play contains much capital comedy, and both the principal characters are admirably played. The gradual thawing of the woman-hating Mr. McKinnel is excellently shown, and Miss Millard has seldom if ever done anything better than her Carey Fernald. Indeed, E. G. Sutherland and B. M. Dix are to be congratulated, both on having suited her so well and on having their character played with such charm. Miss Millard should not need any new play for a long time to come.

"Inconstant George," at the Prince of Wales'.

I confess that I went to see Miss Gladys Unger's adaptation of MM. de Flers and Caillavet's play, "L'Ane de Buridan," with some misgivings. In the original the play is a brilliant, sparkling comedy with rather risky situations, and I could not help wondering how the English authoress would skate over the thin ice. I need have had no fears. The work has been done to perfection, with the smallest of alterations, and the result is a triumph to all concerned. No one can say in this case that the play has doubtless lost much in translation. It has not. It follows the original with extraordinary fidelity, and Miss Unger's work might be taken as a model by all those who wish to prepare plays for the English market. I have revelled in the play in the original, and I frankly admit I enjoyed it just as much in its English form. The wit and lightness of the dialogue are all there, and I would not be surprised if "Inconstant George" makes all London laugh for a year or more. It is quite the most entertaining comedy that has been produced since "The Importance of Being Earnest." I should add that it is beautifully played. Mr. Hawtrey is perfectly suited as the good-hearted, weak-willed Georges Bullin. It is his misfortune more than his fault that he is perpetually getting involved with one, two, and three women at the same time. Even when he escapes from Paris to Brittany it is only to plunge from three town entanglements into three seaside affairs, and though Miss Unger has whitewashed his philanderings she has not robbed them of their essential humour. The surprise of the evening, however, was the Micheline of Miss Doris Lytton. From the moment that this young actress came on the stage she was a favourite, and the simple charm of her performance was delightful. She easily divided the honours with Mr. Hawtrey, and this was a great achievement for a very young and almost unknown artist. She plays the wild little good-hearted girl who has marked Inconstant George for her own and means to carry him off. The trouble is that though George will flirt with married women, widows, and demi-mondaines he has too much respect for innocence to be at home with it. The most amusing act in the play is the great bedroom scene, when the poor hero is kept from going to sleep by friends coming in, until at last, just at daybreak, when he does think to get a few hours' rest, Micheline arrives to take him out fishing, and is exasperated into blurting out her love for him. Equally good, in a different way, is the scene in the last act, when the girl, by way of making a final effort to win her erratic hero, comes to him with a cock-and-bull story about having had a love affair. No longer need he be afraid of her being too innocent to flirt with, and she produces a photograph of the man whom she avers is her lover! Mr. Hawtrey, indignant now, swears he will seek out the man and deal with him, whereupon the poor child, to save trouble, has to confess that the photograph is merely that of a celebrity that she has bought in a shop—in short, that it is Bernard Shaw! Mr. Aubrey Smith is excellent as the philosophic friend, to whose wife and cousin George makes love, and who philosophically asks him to make up his mind between them, and Miss Hilda Moore gives a clever little study of the music-hall artist—the bowdlerised version of the Vivette of the original. I will say no more, except that every one will want to see "Inconstant George," and every one will enjoy it.

"The Bishop's Son," at The Garrick.

I am not going to say anything much about Mr. Hall Caine's newest version of his book, "The Deemster," at the Garrick, except that it affords Mr. J. D. Beveridge a fine chance as the old Bishop who excommunicates his son for committing a murder, and that there is a fascinating dog in the play—a dog that is far more attractive than most of the characters. Mr. Bransby Williams gives an impassioned performance of the man Daniel Mylrea, who expiates his sin in solitude and comes into his own again when the Isle of Man is smitten with plague and he is shown how to play the part of beneficent fairy, while Mr. Shiel Barry is excellent as a young Manxman. Turgid melodrama, though, overloaded with religion, does not appeal to me, and Mr. Hall Caine can write his own appreciations so glowingly that I feel it better to leave the task to him and trust that he will undertake it.

An interesting novelty at the Alhambra is provided by M. Fernand Frey, the French "Protean actor." He plays an ingenious little sketch showing how a man who has fallen in love with a woman "en voyage" adopts a number of disguises in order to approach her and win her heart. M. Frey sings, acts and dances very amusingly, and is exceedingly clever in adopting different disguises. He is well supported by Mlle. Lelette Agoust.

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

MANY people at Newmarket are awaiting the Second October meeting with keen anxiety. King Edward was nearly always down for the Cesarewitch week, and every house at Newmarket was full, many "smart" people being seen who neither know nor care any more about racing than about Chinese metaphysics. It will be possible therefore next week to estimate how far the attendance of company of the class which is eagerly desired at all meetings has been diminished by the late King's death. It is quite certain that of late years the presence of King Edward made all the difference at Newmarket. If his late Majesty were down for the week the place was thronged, but if he were away the attendance in the reserved parts of the stands was limited, and several houses were closed. There might be racing of the very highest interest, but unless the King was to be seen the good sport did not attract the crowd of aristocrats and plutocrats with their hangers-on. It is a flagrant fact that many of the people who have followed Royalty to race meetings do not make even a decent pretence of interesting themselves in the sport, and their ignorance and indifference were more glaringly apparent at Newmarket than anywhere else.

The weather was very fine at Newmarket last week, and there was some capital racing, but the attendance was miserably poor. Yellow Slave and Cardinal Beaufort were heavily backed for the Great Foal Stakes, but the race was won easily by Thalia. The three-year-olds are evidently a most moderate lot. Thalia did not appear to have the ghost of a chance for the Great Foal Stakes on her recent form. Rochester would probably have won this race if he had started. Yellow Slave cannot be trusted to do her best, for on her Doncaster form she certainly ought to have found no difficulty in giving 11 lb. and a beating to Thalia, who was ignominiously defeated the other day at Ayr by so moderate an animal as Cedrus.

There were exciting finishes for some of the two-year-old races, but the running was most perplexing. Putting aside Seaforth, the two-year-olds appear to be all heads and tails together, and the inevitable conclusion is that they are an indifferent lot. Lycaon ought to have defeated Spalato in the Buckenham Stakes with the most extreme ease. At Goodwood Mr. Joel's colt ran Wrinkler to a head, and he is the best of the Duke of Portland's two-year-olds. Now, however, Lycaon could only win after a slashing finish, and only the other day Spalato was badly beaten at Newbury. Still more remarkable was the result of the race for the Boscawen Stakes. Wrinkler had ran Pietri to a head for the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster, and he appeared a certainty for last week's race, but he was most cleverly beaten by Hair Trigger II., while Lycaon was a very bad third. Lord Derby's filly was highly tried early in the summer, but she did not give her best running in her earlier races. Hair Trigger II. has now come into form, and, estimating through Wrinkler and Pietri, it is evident that she is one of the very best two-year-olds of the season. In fact, on the Doncaster and Newmarket running, it appears as if Hair Trigger II. is the best of the two-year-olds, putting aside Seaforth, as there is no line with Mr. McCalmont's colt. Lord Derby's filly is not entered for the Middle Park Plate; she is engaged next year in the One Thousand and Oaks. By the way, I observe that one of the papers complains that neither the Buckenham Stakes nor the Boscawen Stakes races finished at the stand. This is a most asinine grievance. It would be much better in every way for any one to walk down to the T.Y.C. winning post and back instead of spending the interval between the races in lounging about or tippling (probably both) in the stand. Perhaps the most valuable feature at Newmarket is the great variety of courses, there being finishes up hill, down hill, and on the flat, so that any horse capable of winning a race can find itself suited. Slight odds were betted on Sunstar for the Hopeful Stakes, and the race ended in his running a dead-heat with the American colt Borrow, who certainly ought to have won.

Sir E. Cassel's high-priced colt Porphyrio was announced as certain to distinguish himself during the autumn, but he is evidently no flier, as he could only finish third to the head-heaters, although he had a considerable advantage in the weights with both of them. He is grandly bred, being by Gallinule out of Flair, and he cost 3,500 guineas as a yearling. Persephone again disappointed her stable, and this easy course was expected to suit her exactly. She has been one of the great failures of the year. Meleager was plunged upon recklessly for the Triennial, although he did not look well before the race, and he probably needs a rest. There was another very fine finish, and the favourite was just beaten by Invicta, a filly bred and owned by Lord Falmouth, and was much fancied by the Kingsclere people. Her victory was no great achievement, as Meleager was giving her 16 lb., including the sex allowance.

The race for the Jockey Club Stakes was a melancholy farce, as the pace was merely an easy gallop for over a mile. Lemberg had only to wait upon his opponents until the finish, and then he of course beat them for speed without the slightest difficulty. If only Neil Gow had gone on all right this would have been a great race. The odds betted on Lemberg ought to have been considerably longer, as it was evident at the finish that there would be a slow run race. Charlemont ran very badly indeed, his performance sadly disappointing his Newmarket admirers. Lord Durham's colt, however, would have displayed vastly improved form if there had been a strong pace from start to finish. By the way, we saw in this race the glaring absurdity of the Derby winner being permitted to claim a breeding allowance. Lemberg looked very well indeed, and he will presumably fulfil his remaining engagements as a three-year-old at Newmarket next week and at Sandown Park on the 20th.

Senseless unquestionably ought to have won the Great Eastern Railway Handicap, as it was only through his getting off badly and being interfered with that Lady Vista managed to run a dead-heat with Major McLaughlin's horse. Of course, there could be no question of a division, as it was really any odds on the horse; but Mr. Fairie allowed the race to go to Senseless, as he did not care to bring out Lady Vista a second time. Her owner became the object of an outburst of criticism of the most intemperate character from the infuriated backers of his mare. Mr. Fairie would probably have ruined Lady Vista if he had started her for a second race on the hard ground after her severe struggle in the dead heat. Her supporters would most assuredly have lost their money, but backers are utterly impenetrable to common-sense under such circumstances, and a she-bear robbed of her cubs could not have been more furious than the friends of Lady Vista. The mare is engaged in the Cambridgeshire, but her chance does not appear to be good on last week's running. Vigilance, who was a great local tip, began very badly, but he ran creditably, and might have won if he had got off well.

The numerous backers of Electra for the Cambridgeshire were in a state of acute anxiety lest she should be started for the October Handicap, but she did not run, to their immense relief. Highness and Demosthenes were favourites, but Columbus won in a canter, so Major McLaughlin achieved a double event. Highness began slowly, and appeared deficient in speed. She would have been better suited by softer ground. King's Champion was much fancied at Newmarket for this race, but he ran badly.

Winkipop was rather unexpectedly started for the Triennial, and she won in a common canter. Mr. Astor's mare was giving away a lot of weight, but her opponents were a most wretched lot.

There was some heavy plunging on Cyllius for the Rous Memorial Stakes on Friday, but he hopelessly failed in the attempt to give 7 lbs. to Lord Falmouth's Alice, who was said to have been tried to be better than Invicta. Cyllius wants time, and probably Phryxus is at present the best of the Manton two-year-olds, but he is certainly no flier, as at Manchester Seaforth beat him with 15 lbs. the worst of the weights.

Marmalade was considered to be a certainty for the Selling Plate over the Rous course on Thursday, and Mr. Joel's colt was backed down to an exceedingly short price. He had been going very well indeed in his gallops, and he had been a general tip for this race, so there was a rush on him. Marmalade lost a lot of ground at the start, or he would have won easily enough, and he must be remembered next time that he starts, as he is a smart colt.

Lord Derby went back to Scotland after Doncaster races, to finish the deer stalking season at Struy, so Lord Falmouth acted for him last week as deputy steward of the Jockey Club. I suppose it was by an oversight that Lord Falmouth gave the name of Alice to the winner of the Rous Memorial Stakes. According to Rule 65: "A name can only be claimed for a horse . . . provided that the name claimed is not that of a celebrated horse or mare." This rule has been violated, and the best that can be done now is to let the filly be known as Alice II.

I expect that the Imperial Produce Stakes at Kempton Park on Friday will be won by Prince Palatine. There is likely to be a good field for this race, which is worth £3,000. There were fifty-seven acceptances when the last forfeit was declared, including Pietri, Black Potts, Cellini, Meleager, Canvas Back, Phryxus, Cyllius, and the filly by Isinglass out of Sceptre.

I shall give a plumper for Highness for the Duke of York Stakes. The Kempton Park Nursery of £1,000 may be won by Romeo.

Baron E. de Rothschild's filly Nectarine II. won the Prix de la Salamandre at Longchamps last week, the course being seven furlongs. Nectarine II. had several engagements in England earlier in the season, and she was heavily backed for the Wilbraham Plate at the Newmarket First Spring Meeting, but was defeated by Lady Frivoles filly. Nectarine II., who is a daughter of Zinfandel, has no three-year-old engagements in England, nor is she entered for the Grand Prix de Paris.

There will be plenty of racing at Newmarket next week, and most of the two-year-old events appear to be more open than usual.

There are forty-eight entries for the Clearwell Stakes on Tuesday, including several animals which have shown fair form. Tullibardine or Nerestan may win. Sixty-seven fillies are engaged in the Chieveley Park Stakes on Wednesday, including such recent winners as Hair Trigger II., Alice, and Invicta. The race should be won by Hair Trigger II. if she can beat Mary the Second at the weights. It will be remembered that Lord Falmouth's filly came out at Doncaster with a great reputation, but she was beaten there for the Rous Plate by Black Potts. The Bretby Post Stakes on Thursday, which will be worth £900, may be left to Alice, the entry also including Persephone, Spalato, and Sceptre filly. There are forty-seven entries for the Prendergast Stakes, including Wrinkler, Hair Trigger II., Meleager, Dame d'Or colt, Phryxus, and Tullibardine. Phryxus may win if he goes for this race. There are ninety-six entries for the Middle Park Plate, and I shall not go through the list, as the race appears to be a good thing for Seaforth on all recent running. M. E. Blanc has a smart colt in Courtisan, by Flying Fox out of Mlle. de Longchamps, and he will probably repeat Jardy's victory if he comes over, but I hear that he is not likely to start. Courtisan was talked of before Ascot as likely to win the New Stakes, but he was not sent to England. He is engaged next year in the Derby and St. Leger, and as a four-year-old he is entered for the Eclipse Stakes.

There has not been much betting on the Cesarewitch, and speculation is not likely to take a wide range until next Tuesday, when probably the market will to a considerable extent be revolutionised by various developments. Considerations connected with the Duke of York Stakes interfere considerably with the Cesarewitch, and prudent people will leave the Newmarket race alone until after Kempton Park.

When Baltinglass was proclaimed a certainty for the Cesarewitch, because he had run prominently in the St. Leger, Truth was alone in expressing the opinion that Major Loder's horse would be beaten at Newmarket. The fact was that there had really been but little merit about his Doncaster running, and he had no pretensions to stay the Cesarewitch course. Bronzino, with more affinity to reason, is now generally regarded as a really good thing for next week's race, as it is obvious that he is absurdly handicapped on his Grand Prix running. I expect that The Nut will finish in the first three, but am of the opinion that Pure Gem is most likely to be the winner. This horse has been sold by Mr. J. B. Joel to the French Government, and he is to be delivered at the end of next week, so the Cesarewitch is likely to be his last race.

Bayardo is in reserve for the Jockey Club Cup. Lemberg is likely to represent Mr. Fairie in the Champion Stakes, and apparently this race is a certainty for him, in the absence of Neil Gow and Greenback.

JUDGES AND THE LAWS OF GOLF—FOOTBALL—TENNIS.

By the appointment of Mr. Montague Lush, K.C., to the vacancy on the King's Bench caused by the retirement of Mr. Justice Jelf another golfing zealot has become a judge. The report that Mr. A. J. Balfour is revising the rules of golf is denied. The suggestion that the Lord Chief Justice has appointed a rota, consisting of himself and Judges A. T. Lawrence, Scrutton, and Lush, to sit as a divisional court to hear Welsh and English golfing appeals, is equally void of foundation.

In Scotland, I believe, a new judge sits pro formâ to hear some simple motion in the presence of the other judges, and thereupon, having proved himself efficient, he is called to the Bench. The function is a sort of public examination of fitness. Had this practice been pursued in England, Grantham and Bucknill, JJ., would have heard a motion on the rules of the Jockey Club, the Lord Chief Justice one on the rules of the Amateur Athletic Association, and Eldon Bankes, J., would have considered the laws of the Amateur Rowing Association. Under this practice the appointment of Mr. Justice Lush would have been most opportune. The Royal and Ancient Golf Club has just held its general meeting, and it has passed new rules. Wherefore the new judge might have had to consider either what is a club or the precise effect of the new rule as to lifting and teeing a ball in stroke play. As to the latter rule, it is about as mysterious as some of the statutes relating to copyright. Perhaps Scrutton, J., might employ his spare time and write a thesis thereon. In the Vacation Court he stated he granted leave to serve some notice of motion just after he had done a lovely drive and before the final putt. An irreverent junior wondered whether his partner was badly bunkered or hunting for a sliced ball meanwhile.

But to return to the rules. The acceptance of the new and remarkable definition of a club knocks out the Schenectady putter and creates a severance as regrettable as it is unnecessary between British and American golf. The definition is clumsy and cumbrous, and the rule of the golf committee gives a list of the considerations which will guide it in interpreting the rules. Among these considerations is one which refers to the Park and Fairlie clubs as examples. Now to refer to any article at a given date as an example for futurity is dangerous. Fifty or sixty years hence these clubs may be a name and no more. If the game as to clubs is to be standardised, and if these clubs are permissible, then properly authenticated copies should be preserved not only at St. Andrews, but at every golf club house of repute. They should be as carefully guarded as the standard measurements are at the Guildhall or at Westminster. To many these clubs seem of strange device, and if, like Longfellow's Alpine climber, the golfer chooses to grasp his clubs of strange device, why hinder him? His motto is very praiseworthy. It is Excelsior, meaning "Be up." He will not be any more up than with the ordinary tool, but he thinks he will, and so why make him unhappy?

Then as to the rule that permits a ball to be lifted and teed under a penalty of two strokes in stroke play. Well, this seems to have been tinkered with without any very definite object. Of course, it would be impertinent to suggest that the committee had not some very definite objective in view. But the only effect of the verbal changes is that a golf lawyer can argue that if the old ball is lifted, a new one may be teed in its place. All one can say is that if this is what the committee meant it is a pity they did not say so. To chop and change a rule without any definite object merely creates confusion and embarrassment. Then there is another alteration in Rule 10 which permits a player to have an opponent's ball lifted if it interferes with his "play." Previously the word stroke was used. This is a wider definition, and allows a player to have the ball up if, for instance, it catches his eye or if the ball is missed or merely touched on the tee. Then if the other man wants to tee from the same spot or near it he can have the ball up. The stroke rule as to teeing and the definition of a club are more or less mysterious. But they are, I am given to understand, quite comprehensible as to effect and intention to any intelligent golfer. All I can say is that Form 4 is mere bumble puppy compared with the legislative efforts of the members of the Royal and Ancient Golf Club of St. Andrews.

So much for the laws of golf. But there were other important matters to be considered. The suggestion that the amateur international match should consist of three matches of thirty-six holes each played to a finish by foursomes was adopted. Perhaps this decision may tend to revive foursome play, or rather to create a liking for it in the hearts of many southern players whose great objection is that they like to hit their own ball and have to wait too long, and do not get enough exercise in a foursome. The foursome has died out owing to the pot-hunting, betting golfer of the south. He does not mind playing for his own hand, but he is not going to let anybody else have a finger in his pie. He forgets that he might have a finger in spoiling some one else's pie. He is pre-eminently selfish, and considers himself a golf purist of the highest order. A good many of these golfers would find their own competition play much improved if they trained themselves to endure the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune in a foursome. The fear of putting your partner in trouble is mutual.

Of course, there was the autumn meeting after all this legislation. For the first time Mr. Fairlie won the King William IV. with a splendid score of 74. There were 149 entries, including four ex-amateur champions and four runners-up for that event. Mr. Fairlie is one of the finest putters in the golfing world. There is a Fairlie club, and he used to use the schenectady, and without it he wins this medal for the first time. Much ado about nothing. Seventeen out of eighteen holes were done in par score. For the club's gold medal Messrs. Edward Blackwell, Shaw, and Captain Skene tied with 77. Mr. Shaw was unable to play, and Mr. Blackwell won with another 74. By the way, the Hon. Alfred Lyttelton and Mr. A. J. Balfour played together. The one took eight and the other took nine at the difficult second, and yet Mr. Lyttelton returned an 82. The News of the World final draws nigh, and every one is hoping J. H. Taylor will have recovered from his taxicab accident. He has sprained his wrist badly, and this year he has had illness and accident one after the other. But he can still play. Just a little.

With regard to what I said last week about foot faults in lawn tennis by players on private courts, a correspondent says they are prevalent in tournaments, and umpires, owing to the difficulty of decision, are often compelled to give offenders the benefit of the doubt. The trouble, of course, arises owing to the desire to run in on the service. But in private courts players, too, often take advantage of the blind eye by actually serving with a foot on the line. My correspondent suggests that all services should be made from behind a line one yard behind the base line. I presume then that if both feet were behind this line when the ball is thrown into the air he would be satisfied. He makes this suggestion having often sat in the umpire's chair. There may be some great objection to the alteration, but at first sight it would appear to do away with the run in difficulty, and by putting the service farther away from the net the advantage of the service would be slightly diminished. At all events the existing rule is not satisfactory in practice.

* * * * * *

The great event in Rugby football last week was the visit of the Old Merchant Taylors to Newport. They only lost by two tries to one try, and on the run of the game they could consider themselves unlucky to lose. Raphael played a fine game at back. The Harlequins after the first twenty minutes simply romped over Richmond, scoring as and when they pleased. The United Services beat Blackheath, who had Goatly and Coverdale, by a goal and two tries to nothing. The Service halves, Ferguson and Stephens, quite held their own against the two Internationals opposed to them. Rosslyn Park have held together for many years. They are quite in the front rank of Rugby clubs. They have drawn with the Scottish, but the innate Toryism of Rugby football prevents them being considered fashionable ground for selection committees. By the way, I wonder if other clubs will try the Harlequin method of returning the kick off. They took the ball and at once passed it instead of kicking. They nearly got in. Thus was the first try scored against Wales last year.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE question of the rule of the road is under discussion again, and once more the desirability of the adoption of one universal practice by international agreement is being urged. There is no denying the importance of the matter. Nothing could be more unsatisfactory than the existing state of things, whereby one rule prevails in one country and the opposite in another, and it says something for the flexibility of the human mind that accidents do not occur more often than they do. It only remains to consider which system should be adopted—keeping to the left, as with us, or keeping to the right, as with most Continental countries and America. Seeing that we are in such a hopeless minority in the matter, it might be not unreasonably supposed that we must necessarily be in the wrong, and that the keeping to the right rule must be really the most convenient. Reflection suggests, however, that this is not actually the case—so long, at any rate, as drivers sit on the right.

Reason dictates, in fact, that if drivers sit on the right they should keep to the left, and vice versâ. Not only are they better placed in this way for judging their distance when meeting other vehicles, but they are better placed for overtaking also. Consider what happens, for instance, when a driver sitting on the right and keeping to the right has to overtake on the left, as in France. He is in the worst position possible for seeing in good time whether there is any other vehicle coming from the opposite direction, since not till his own vehicle has got almost on a level with the one he is overtaking is he able to do so. With our rule, on the other hand, one sees at once when overtaking another vehicle whether the road is clear or not, and can go ahead or fall back accordingly. Obviously the English system scores here.

The Frenchman might reply that this could be met by maintaining the Continental rule and putting the driver on the left; and this would be perfectly true—up to a point. That is to say keeping to the right, and sitting on the left would give just the same effect as keeping to the left and sitting on the right. But there would be this important difference between the two, to wit, that it would be inconvenient for most drivers to sit on the left for the simple reason that the majority of men are right-handed. For this reason, therefore, the English system is demonstrably the better. Happily many of the leading French motorists, including the Marquis de Dion, recognise the force of this reasoning, and a vigorous movement is already on foot in France to bring about the universal adoption of the English system.

In response to an invitation from the See Band and Tyre Company, the proprietors of the Margett's sectional tyre, as to which I had some remarks in these notes the other day, I paid a visit to their premises in Charing Cross Road to inspect the invention one day last week, and was interested to hear what they had to say about it. I gathered that the inventors are supremely confident as to the success of the tyre, and if the figures they quoted as to contracts which they have already made with large corporations go for anything, their confidence is shared by independent outsiders. As to the possibility of grit and water getting through the joints of the segments, they declare that experiments have proved this to be an absolute impossibility—a car fitted with the tyres having been driven for hours in water, on the edge of the sea, without the wet penetrating at all. Then, with regard to the security of the tyre in the case of deflation, they state that there is not the least tendency for it to detach itself. At the same time, they say that anyone desiring them could have security bolts fitted, though they agree that seven security bolts per wheel—one for each section of the tyre—would be a bit of a nuisance, and they do not, therefore, recommend them. Whether, however, they could be safely dispensed with in the case of a worn tyre seems rather doubtful, even though a new cover may hold effectually enough. But these and other points will soon be cleared up in the most practical manner when the tyres get to work in numbers on the road, and meanwhile it may be said without hesitation that the invention is certainly an ingenious one.

The Motor Union has performed a useful service to owners of cars by extracting a statement from the Treasury as to whether an owner who had paid duty on the old scale on a car which he had disposed of before July 1, when the revised duty came in force, could or could not claim rebate in respect of the duty so paid. Some of the local authorities had adopted the view that in such a case the rebate could not be claimed, and had been requesting owners to pay up in full as though they had not paid anything before at all. Happily, the Treasury, on being applied to, has been quite explicit on the subject, stating that "when a new car has been acquired in place of the car for which the original licence was taken out a fresh licence is required, but the duty already paid in respect of the original licence will be allowed or repaid."

I was glad to notice a sensible letter from Mr. S. F. Edge in the Times last week on the subject of visible exhaust from motor cars. As it is, those who offend in the manner referred to are allowed to make themselves a nuisance without let or hindrance. To stand at any point, such as Piccadilly Circus or Charing Cross, where cars and motor 'buses are thickly congregated, is to be almost suffocated at times by the abominable stench, the greater part of which is totally unnecessary. Evil-smelling fumes from motor car exhausts are due nowadays to carelessness, and nothing else, on the part of either the maker or the driver, or both. There is not the slightest reason why such a nuisance should be tolerated, and if the police bestirred themselves to terminate it by taking action against offenders, they would have the support, not only of the public at large, but of all right-thinking motorists as well.

What is the proper punishment for the young miscreants who throw stones at cars? Most people would probably agree that something more than the mere "talking to" which magistrates usually consider sufficient is required to meet the needs of the case. Only the other day a case occurred within my own knowledge which might easily have had the most serious consequences, though in this instance only indirectly. The stone thrown missed its mark, but the motorist promptly stopped his car and, reversing very quickly, only just escaped backing right into a car which was coming up behind him. The moral, perhaps, was that one should not reverse suddenly without looking behind, but in stopping his car and trying to catch the offenders the motorist was only adopting a course which all should pursue in like circumstances. If every driver made a point of stopping and running down these young rascals the effect could not fail to be salutary.

The makers of the Pirelli tyres write that they have been awarded the Grand Prix in respect of their exhibit at the Brussels Exhibition—a circumstance which will surprise no one acquainted with the excellent qualities of these well-known Italian tyres. Pirelli tyres, the makers recall, were used by Prince Borghese on his tour from Pekin to Paris and likewise by Signor Scarfoglio on his similar jaunt from New York to the same destination.

THE M.D.E.W.P.

THE M.D.E.W.P. is the very youngest of all societies. Even the idea of it is only a few hours old, and the society itself is still on the knees of the gods. This seems a pity, because it certainly is designed to fill a long-felt want. Its object must appeal to a very large number of people, from whom it will count on subscriptions. And the curious point about it, and one which would ensure the continuance of the subscriptions, is that, although a charitable organisation, the charity would be extended towards subscribers. In fact, the M.D.E.W.P., stated at length, is nothing more or less than the Mission for Dressing Earnest Women Properly (undenominational, non-party, international), supported by voluntary and even willing contributions, and with the motto, "I serve."

The New, Easy, Sure, At-home Way.

At what period in the world's history there first arose the monstrous heresy that ugliness is a virtue, and untidiness is inconspicuous, it is impossible to say. Dirt we have always known to be a vice, and as such have always associated it with the artistic temperament. We have always desired that the deserving poor should be as neat and clean as if there were two bathrooms in every cottage, and cheval glasses before which they might dress themselves. But while we require these things from the deserving poor, the righteous rich have always set their faces against the reprehensible cult of beauty. To do one's hair becomingly, it seems, is to shake hands with the devil, while to prefer becoming colours is to put one's name down in good time for the final and most disciplinarian of all public schools. It is against these beliefs that the M.D.E.W.P. remains unformed.

Why should not good works and pretty bonnets be compatible? Why should we try to look as much as possible like Dutch dolls in our coiffures when we are going district-visiting? Why should not only charity, but thought, be considered irreconcilable with a pleasing appearance? It cannot be ungallant to point out that at any public meeting held by women, or any church function, the ladies interested will have concluded, in some proportion like nineteen out of twenty, that looks don't matter. They quite agree that the human soul is a divine and a sacred fire, but they apparently think that its grail is of no account. We live in a misguided age, in which it is believed that beauty is conspicuous and ugliness unnoticeable. For this reason, since a gentlewoman's appearance should always be unremarkable, we do our best to multiply ugliness and diminish beauty. So completely is this accepted that the words "earnest" and "worthy," as applied to women, carry not only a mental, but a physical significance. We know exactly what ladies so described look like. Shapeless garments, abominable colours like wet fogs, an absence of finish about the throat, skirts which rise in a semi-circle from the floor in front, and then, with belated dignity, trail upon the ground behind—these are the perpetrations which we associate with the adjective "earnest."

It is, of course, highly improper that any woman should be stared at in the street, but if she is of an appearance so remarkable that this calamity becomes unavoidable, how much better it is that she should be conspicuous for the pleasantness of her appearance rather than for its ugliness. The ordinary parish worker, put side by side with the average intelligent woman, of like income and similar social status, is thoroughly and almost improperly conspicuous by the obvious indignities to which she has subjected her appearance. To take hair, that long, silky wonder of complicated tissues, which has as many moods and tenses as she has, which is sensitive to her slightest change of feeling, which even St. Paul considered a charm—to take that and brush it flat, and twist what won't be brushed flat into the smallest, hardest, dullest likeness to a walnut that can be achieved—this is to be a heathen, and require a missionary from the M.D.E.W.P.

If a snowdrop took upon itself to consider white a vain and frivolous and slightly improper garb, and came up charity-flannel colour, what should we think of it? What have hens gained by becoming domesticated British matrons? Once they were the gorgeous pheasants of the Indian jungle, but since they took to laying eggs for the benefit of the community they have degenerated into something thoroughly parochial, and, like the duck in Oscar Wilde, they view with suspicion a rocket that comes down in golden rain, and say to it: "May I ask, were you born like that, or is it the result of an accident?" In that joy of the last generation's childhood, Mrs. Ewing's "Jackanapes," Miss Jessamine's aunt is very much upset because her niece has such "conspicuous" yellow hair. There we have in plain terms the statement of our heresy.

It is our fault if beauty is conspicuous. It ought to be a matter of course. So far as the human person is concerned, Nature and Civilisation sometimes make this difficult. All the more does it behove us to do our share in making the look of the world tolerable, and as for associating the present neglect with intellect, charity, and the public welfare, it is simply scandalous! In many ways the M.D.E.W.P. will be unique. It will largely be supported by artists and other lovers of the beautiful; it will never expect to be anything but insolvent; it will be from the first considered irreligious; though perhaps its greatest claim to serious consideration is that there is no probability of its ever existing.

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Thursday.—Diana grows more and ever more arbitrary. She telephoned me this morning to order me peremptorily to take an interest in gardens.

"But I have not a garden," I protested; she reproached and then conciliated me.

"Well, you must devote yourself to your window-boxes. Everybody is interested in flowers, and you are nothing if you are not in the movement; grow beautiful blooms on your leads."

I have not any leads, and my one window-box holds a few wholesome purple and red fuschias with great content. But I am keen to please Diana, for, like another heroine, she is very kind and always anxious to teach. She had just been to the Horticultural Show in Vincent Square, where she seems to have suddenly discovered flowers. It is true now that the fashion of their tendance marches quickly, and that everybody is a gardener, though intensive culture absorbs only the mere tradesman. Diana despises me for liking asparagus and new potatoes and peas at Christmas time, and yearns to turn my desires towards more æsthetic reasons for tilling the ground. It was no use repeating I had not any ground; Diana proceeded calmly on her instructive way, and I suppose I shall have to trespass somewhere with a spade before she is satisfied with me.

At the moment I led her to more intimate things, and she told me she was going to Newmarket next week, and that she had bought a new dress of dark brown ratine for no other reason than that her last year's blue serge refused any longer to hold together. The ratine dress, which is of superior diagonal surface, has a tunic with a band of skunk to decorate it, and it is to be accompanied with a moufflon hat of brown with a skunk band held with a dull gold ornament with dangling ends. Further, Diana has secured a skunk scarf, while she is perfectly certain it is going to rain, and that her only wear will be a shiny mackintosh and a suède hat of smoke grey.

And after listening to her varied words of wisdom I walked in Regent's Park to discover all I wanted of the joys of flowers in some combinations of green and brown and red leaves and berries with white lilies, and mauve things that look like thistles but are not. I rejoiced in clumps of scarlet geraniums placed high with artistic irregularity in a stone tazza, and admired two yellow headed little boys wearing rifle green serge knickerbockers and tunics held with brown belts, soft green felt hats, short green socks, and brown shoes. Groups of white-linened nurses were discussing their mistresses' high ways and holidays, stray artists were hugging portfolios under their arms while making their way to secluded spots upon which they had designs—or hoped to have—and the sun shone in yellow glory on chrysanthemums, orange, mauve, cream, and apricot-pink. Perhaps Diana is right, and, after all, she has the authority of Voltaire: "We must cultivate our gardens."

Friday.—Nita and Virginia came up to spend a day and a night to give me a little general information on the subject of cottages and the joys of living in the country, and to persuade me to take them to see George Alexander in brave martial array as "D'Arcy of the Guards." He makes love in so tender and bewitching a style that it is amazing Evelyn D'Alroy should resist him until the last act, whatever his politics. There is an extraordinary likeness between pretty Marjery Maude and her mother. Her biting of the nether lip, her uplifted eyebrows, her petulant gestures are Winifred Emery to the life, and she has just the pout of her and the charm of her in embryo. It is a pleasant little play, and Nita was enraptured at its simplicity; and in the intervals I sat and talked to Mrs. D——, and noted how admirably her hair was dressed, with a broad band of black velvet, held with a quaint ornament of diamonds, rubies, and emeralds, closely set into a rough gold foundation. She wore an attractive frock, too, of black chiffon lined with steel spotted net, a little ivory lace being across the décolletage in the front, while round her neck was a very narrow, tight black velvet band holding an old paste pendant.

This tight black velvet band is the delight of the world fashionable just now. We seem to have decided to eschew the secure comfort of the collar-band in the day as well as in the evening time, a custom which should be more honoured in the breach than in the observance by those matrons whom the time machine has given wrinkles round the throat. However, Virginia refused to allow me to cavil at the present fancy on the score of its novelty, for the black velvet neck-band obtained in the pretty period when D'Aroy made love to his Pamela, and brocaded panniers bunched themselves decoratively on the hips, and lace frills meandered round fichus which were decorously held with roses.

We three women came back to enjoy our hair-brushing and hot cocoa in company, and I persuaded my little guests to recognise that there is some advantage in beds with spring mattresses, and that electric light has illuminative virtues.

Nita gave me cause to think with a tale of an old lady, aged ninety-seven, who had told her she was buying her autumn gown of black satin because it wears so well.

This recalls the ancient moralist who, numbering ninety years, refused a whisky and soda because it was such a bad habit to contract.

Saturday.—I left my visitors to the glory of visiting establishments where they furnish cottages for a hundred pounds and upwards including the cat on the kitchen hearth, and I went to lunch with Joan. She was deep in Frank Danby's new book, "Let the Roof Fall In," and resented my mentioning the facts that it was half-past one and that I was hungry.

"Let the Roof Fall In" is a good title, but up to date I have not got any further, for at the library they tell me there is a waiting list of anxious readers who will preclude my obtaining it for at least a week; and alas! the Michaelmas bills are a serious bar to my purchasing it, a course I generally pursue when any desirable volume lags by the way. I am specially eager to read this, since the author definitely announced his intention of writing no more novels, and then immediately sat down to prove himself a woman by heralding two works in the press. Sex will out.

Joan has a new velvet frock in dark olive green trimmed with wide silk galon held with dull gold buttons, and she has persuaded her last year's ermine to trim a scarf and muff to match; and she has given herself a wide-brimmed velvet hat with a bronze ribbon tying up bronze and green and gold roses upon its crown. She ordered all this down for my inspection because she wanted to go on reading whilst lunching, but I became an active objector, not to be soothed even by some excellent devilled oysters and a superior game pie. There are moments when Joan imposes upon my intimacy with her. I consider I did my duty for the season when I heard her daughter recite her own poems; and already she threatens me with a new terror; her son is learning to play the violin quite nicely. Ugh!

Later I dressed in my new purple ninon lined with cerise and giddy with multi-coloured beads, and enjoyed the inconstant Charles Hawtrey as the inconstant George Bullin, at the Prince of Wales' Theatre.

The frocks on the stage are very good, even though those of the lady and the lady-like are not sufficiently differentiated. All are tarred—and feathered—with the same ultra-smart brush. The schemes in many instances are polychromatic; and every device of bead, bugle, jewel, and silken tracing in its turn plays the part of decoration. But on the whole, costume here is a thing of beauty and the play a joy for ever, so long as the incomparable Charles exercises his pas de fascination and finesse.

Sunday.—I joyously attended a theatrical lunch party, where beautiful and famous damsels and no less alluring heroes of dramatic light and literature mustered to the number of a delightful dozen. Lilian Braithwaite was there in a quaintly flowered foulard crowned with a black hat trimmed with tri-coloured satin roses. Constance Collier wore mole-grey, decked with Oriental embroidery, and Mrs. G. of note looked very nice in a black chiffon tunic veiling sapphire blue charmeuse, while Suzanne Sheldon well became a soft black velvet cap outlined with dull silver lace. We discussed new plays and parts and terms and conditions and vowed ourselves and each other to an inviolable secrecy, as solemnly as if the joys of gossip were not irresistible ar t there lurked no suspicion behind H. G. Wells' dogma that everything is known because nobody talks. Then William joined us at tea wearing another contributed waistcoat of crochet. Truly he inspires as much industry as an early Victorian curate; and I suspect if he he-l not he will one day be found putting his foot into matrimony with embroidered slippers smoothing the way.

Mrs. A.'s Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

Camma.—There are two descriptions of ratine: one has a surface like our old friend pilot-cloth, and the other has a wide diagonal stripe. Both are quite soft, and the prices vary from 5s. 6d. to 10s. 6d. per yard.

Raffles.—I have answered your letter by post, and hope you received it in time. I feared a reply here would be too late to be of any use to you.

Peterkin.—Those feather caps are rather hard, and I should advise a full crown of velvet outlined with a band of your feather and some erect mount. Take the trimming to the Parisian Hat Company, 30, New Bond Street, and I am sure they will do it for you if you mention my name. Green velvet would be best.

Mrs. Q.—I look upon the incident as quite complimentary. Purple velveteen of the chiffon description, and get it from Liberty's. Jewels to be amethyst and roc pearls, combined with much gold rather dull in tone; no lace, but chiffon or tulle of the same colour.

WOMEN AND HEALTH.

It is, of course, natural and right that women should associate themselves specially with the welfare of the human body, since this it is to understand the art of mothering in its widest sense. It is for this reason that cookery is so largely in the hands of women, that dressmaking and housekeeping are dependent on women workers (the man-milliner and tailor being evolutions from this idea, and not altering it), and that the care of the sick should always have been in the hands of women, although social conditions for long forbade that women should be doctors.

The low esteem in which nursing was held for a long time—it was considered a menial job until Florence Nightingale and Dickens between them cleared away this absurd stigma—was a curious effect of a period rather than due to any underlying principle, and now we find that health in its wider aspects is coming under the care of women. Increasing numbers of women sanitary inspectors, health visitors, factory inspectors, and inspectors in many branches where the Government exercises supervision, such as over boarded-out children, prove that women are not shirking the more disagreeable and tedious ways of caring for human beings. Women doctors are certainly coming to the fore, or perhaps it would be a higher tribute to their progress to say that they are now taken as a matter of course. I believe a certain doctor once expressed at a Medical Congress the opinion that it was indecent for a female nurse to look after a male patient. He was immediately asked if it was indecent for a male doctor to look after a female patient, and the association which was responsible for appointing him as their delegate hastened to disown him so far as these opinions went. But the overwhelming majority of doctors either ignore or do not trouble to consider the unpleasant sex element in a matter where obvious natural fitness dictates that a woman is more fitted to care for the sick than a man. I hear that at some stations where large liners call, the medical inspection is in the hands of women doctors.

They get through the work in a third of the time, and do not find so much false modesty in the male steerage passengers as men doctors do in the women of the steerage, while no one, except a few conservative first-class elderly gentlemen, has yet objected to filing past a woman instead of a man.

But admirable though it is that women should take for their particular care the welfare of the sick, it is still better that they should interest themselves actively in the prevention of suffering. Sanitary inspection, of course, comes very largely under this head, and a good deal of medical work to-day goes on the lines that prevention is better than cure. But a more definite movement in this direction is provided by the various associations which occupy themselves with the dissemination of hygienic knowledge, and the success of one such enterprise marks a definite stage in the work of this nature now being done. A few weeks ago the Women's Imperial Health Association sent out a caravan to give health lectures in country places. It was called the "Aurora," and was provided with a cinematograph and a magic lantern, which included slides of famous pictures rather ingeniously titled to enforce the tenets of hygiene. For instance, Luke Fildes' picture, "The Doctor," had a sub-heading, "Or 'The Closed Window.'" This caravan has met with a success among the most impervious class of British country people which must have exceeded the wildest hopes of its promoters. A marked increase in the number of open windows in each town or village has succeeded the lectures. The masses of literature distributed have not been thrown down carelessly, but apparently were taken home and digested. Applications for visits from the caravan have poured in in such numbers that two new ones are going out. One has already started, and is staffed entirely by women. In many districts local ladies have bestirred themselves to form branches of the association to carry on the work of explaining clearly and sensibly to the working man's wife and daughter why it is bad to do certain things. The cinematograph is, in fact, the modern parable. A parable was as it were a cinematograph illustration of a moral admonition, and this modern adaptation of the parable has apparently carried conviction into places hitherto made inaccessible by centuries of prejudice and ignorance. So marked is the effect that the London County Council has given permission for cinematograph displays of a similar nature in the London parks, and by a new invention these are made possible by daylight.

The programme of the Annual Conference of the National Union of Women Workers is another proof of the way in which women are working on the one hand to cure evil, on the other to prevent it. It is, therefore, a pleasant task to congratulate women on the fact that they are doing much more than act as the ministering angel of poetry and sentiment. To glide about a sick room picturesquely handing delicate preparations to a patient, or laying cool hands upon his fevered brow, is well; but to see that healthy brows do not become fevered is better. It is duller, requires more sustained hard work, and gains less applause, but it proves that women are realising that as in the individual they mother their children, so it is their duty to band together to mother their country.

NOVELISTS AND BABIES.

With "The Divine Fire" Miss May Sinclair earned the right to be considered a serious writer. "The Creators" (Constable, 6s.) does something to sustain that right. Its problem in a nutshell is whether childbearing and genius can exist satisfactorily together. The excellent working-out of the characters in no fewer than five geniuses and one would-be genius provides a good deal of excuse for a vast amount of literary shop, to say nothing of a meticulous psychology that almost obscures the main issue. Jane Holland and George Tanqueray very nearly married each other. Instead she marries a man of the world—Broderick and his family are almost the best characters in the book—while he marries a very charming little servant girl. One of Jane's children develops nerves, and she is told that it is her fault. Through accusations of neurosis she very nearly becomes neurotic. The violent swings of Jane's pendulum between her duty to her children and her duty to her genius are worked out with extreme subtlety; the straightforward emotions of Tanqueray's little servant wife form a skilful contrast. Further, Miss Sinclair has avoided to a very great extent the mawkishness that nearly always invests the woman genius. At the same time the book is limited by its shoppiness. An engineer in a novel is not expected to describe the action and reaction of every screw of his machine. Nor would any one but the "little clever people" Miss Sinclair despises so much, gain greatly from following the almost technical psychology of the "little clever people" in her book. Methinks, by the way, that literary genius should not say "except you and I!"

The same problem of child and genius is worked out in "Separate Stars" (Murray, 6s.), by Miss Violet Pearn, with the frankest absence of subtlety. Joan might have been a great painter, and she indicates her potentialities by talking of half-lengths and the effect of sunlight upon white flannels. Fortunately her father cannot provide money for her to swell the ranks of the incompetent by studying at a school of art. In despair she marries Roger, a very pleasing young soldier. Joan decides that her artistic leanings shall find an outlet in her child. He really does paint, but disappoints her in his method. She sustains her artistic obsession to the end by letting art come between her and a possible second husband. This book shows painfully the pathos of "culture" in these democratic days.

Mrs. Gertie de S. Wentworth-James continues her colour scheme of "Pink Purity" and "Scarlet Kiss" with "White Wisdom" (Everett, 2s.). Louise Hearn works in the folding-room of the "Weekly Flashlight," but her hands, manner, and bearing betray the genteel blood that is hers. Her white wisdom carries her past the temptations of young men, racing, and beauty shows, and nearly determines one young man to make her his wife. It is a coincidence that Louise's unknown mother should be wife of the "Weekly Flashlight" proprietor, who loses his money, and that her mother's godfather should leave her money on condition of her having had a child whatsoever. She is able to reassure the young man, and as Louise can eat both oysters and asparagus correctly she lives presumably happily ever afterwards. The aitchless characters in the folding room are well described.

Tragedy unadulterated is the key-note of "To-day and Love" (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.), by Miss Maud Yardley. Mona begins by renouncing her high-born lover, in spite of a potential pledge of affection; he marries a woman he cannot love. Mona marries a man she is to learn to love. Wigram's wife in the meantime discovers the likeness between Mona's boy and her husband, and, feeling slighted, very naturally makes mischief. A murder and suicide form the penultimate stage of a book in which both nature and art are conspicuous by their absence.

LETTER FROM MADGE.

Dearest Amy,—I have just got back from an enjoyable week spent with the Greys at their pretty place near Bath. The weather was splendid, and the lovely views from the house and gardens looked their very best in the bright sunshine, and almost as well in the early mornings, when the greyish-blue mists hung round the trees and slowly uncurled from the hills. One of the girls has developed into an enthusiastic gardener, and I learned the names of many flowers which I hope to start next season—sweet peas, roses, antirrhinums, fuchsias, and so on. Ella has not started a ditch yet, the latest craze of all garden-owners in Essex. It has not travelled to Somersetshire, but will spread all over the country before long, I suppose. The recipe appears to be something like this: First dig your ditch; then send all the available boys of the countryside to fetch the biggest stones—great slabs, if possible. These are set up against the side of the ditch and little trees planted among them, with ferns and other ditch-loving greenery and flowers.

It was lovely to sit on the lawn surrounded by a family of terrier puppies about three weeks old and watch their idiotic little ways and mark their utter inexperience. Each one of the family of four had a distinct and different character from the other three. One was little better than a chapter of lamentations; another was incurably stupid; the third was so greedy that it had to be held by the tail from running into the very middle of the dish of food; and the fourth is quite a perfect character. At the age of one month he follows his young mistress, and, though he has already learned to bark (the oddest possible little sound!), yet he never does so when in the drawing-room. He eats with dignity and grace, and is the flower of the flock. What an inexhaustible number of types Nature has stowed away in her marvellous repertory! Not even two puppies are precisely alike, either in character or appearance.

Do you know Bath? I was taken duly to see the sights, the Pump-room that I have longed to see ever since I first read Miss Austen's novels; the excavated Roman remains, proving how luxurious were the habits of the early Romans (just like those of our golden youth of to-day); and the beautiful old Abbey with its saints climbing Jacob's ladder on either side of the great door. We prowled about it, reading the epitaphs, among them one that asked the visitor to drop a generous tear on the "devoted stone" that covered a lady who was apparently a perfect paragon. But tears are not so handy nowadays as in the sentimental era when those rhyming epitaphs were composed, and we could not muster even a small one among us.

Being curious to taste the celebrated Bath bun, we adjourned to the Empire Hotel and had a delicious tea, looking out on the river Avon and listening to the soothing murmur of the weir. The scenery is lovely all round Bath, and I enjoyed the pretty drives and the glorious views set in bright sunshine.

Bath is a fashionable resort of the insect world, and September is the pet month of the creepy-crawlies and winged things. They like to pasture on strangers, so I was soon patterned over with rose-red mementoes of their preference, and was told by my hosts that of the 450 known varieties of insect in England some 300 species favour Bath as headquarters. Lord Avebury would be very happy there. He could study them and they could sample him, to the great mutual pleasure of both parties. There is a small but particularly active and hungry midge that must, I feel sure, be first cousin to a mosquito. Its most industrious meal is made at tea time, a circumstance of which I had proof positive. This midge likes visitors to wear open-work stockings and lace blouses. It can then browse without over-exertion, a state of things favourable to digestion I believe. One can scarcely, however, associate the idea of a digestive apparatus with anything so minute as a midge.

The Arthurs have been at Penzance, and they describe the sea as resembling the Italian lakes in calmness and serenity. They went to Land's End one day in search of more bracing breezes, but there were none of the plunging breakers and spray-dashing waves that are usually to be seen there. Which do you prefer? The calm of summer seas or the commotion and restlessness of turbulent waters? I suppose there is a part of us that responds to the charm of each, according to our mood.

Richard is much exercised about the shortage of horses for the Army. He was at the Dublin Horse Show and saw with sorrow the foreign buyers securing almost all the best horses. As a member of the Hunters' Improvement Society, he is greatly interested in the scheme drawn up by its council under the chairmanship of Lord Helmsley, and is making love to all the M.P.'s he knows with the idea of urging on the Government the pressing importance of doing something at once.

Have you read about the four men who occupied four stalls at the first night of "The Chocolate Soldier" at the Lyric Theatre and have telephoned to inquire if it is possible to secure for them the same four stalls for the same play on September 11 of next year? One wonders if the little arrangement will come off. A year seems such a very long way ahead and such a scrap of time to look back upon. Don't you think so?

The twenty-first Cookery and Food Exhibition is to be held on November 1 to 5, and will be even more interesting than its predecessors. Many of the entries close on the 11th of this month, so if your cook has an idea of competing she should send at once for a schedule of the exhibits to 329, Vauxhall Bridge Road. I see that several of the competitions are for vegetarian and non-fruitarian dishes, a sign of the times, for vegetarianism is growing rapidly. I want to see the Concours de cuisine chaude, when the competitors prepare some very nice entrées, including sole à la Dugleré with pommes à l'anglaise.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

If the country that has no history is happy, its historians are not, neither of the greater, nor of the lesser sort; these latter, the chroniclers from week to week and day to day who may be said to stand in the same relation to history that the minor poets do to poetry. The slack season falls very heavily on them; the spirit of slackness seems to brood over everyone and everything, as if in sympathy with Nature at a relaxing "fall" time. Yet things go on happening in the autumn as in any other time, though for some reason or other they do not shape themselves into any kind of history. Roosevelt roused our attention in Ireland when he went lion-hunting in Africa, but the pot-hunting in America of our own Irish politicians, just as eventful in its own

Lord and Lady Aberdeen have been absent from Ireland on a short holiday. Of Lady Aberdeen it can only be said that she takes a holiday from Irish activities, occupying herself in their place with those benevolent ones in her native land, to which her zeal extends. It is announced that the Chief Secretary and Mrs. Birrell will at last pay a visit to Ireland, taking up their residence for a short time at the Lodge in the Phœnix Park, to which Mr. Birrell has never taken kindly.

With October the dawn begins after the dead season in Dublin, the capital resumes its more busy position as a capital. The streets are already recovering their all-but-of-tourist-deserted appearance, and the desolate aspect of shuttered windows in the best squares and residential streets is rapidly disappearing. These squares and streets, incongruously enough, are mainly the property of Lord Pembroke, an alien in the country. The possession of a very large and valuable property in Ireland for long years has never made the Pembroke family live on the land which brought and brings them such a fine income. In fact, they never, as we say over here, "mixed" with the "mere Irish," who merely paid the rent. The present Lord Pembroke is what may be known as a benevolent "carpet bag" landlord, hardly known by sight to anyone in the country in the capital of which he has such a large interest.

Lady Brooke, the wife of Sir George Brooke, of Summerton, who died last week, was a very popular member of Irish society. She was a beautiful woman, with a sweet and charming personality. In her early days she was well known as one of the most distinguished beauties of the Viceregal Court. She was the only sister of Miss Rose Barton, the well-known artist, and the step-sister of General Sir Hugh McCalmont and Colonel J. McCalmont. Sir George Brooke, a governor of the Bank of Ireland, was created a baronet a few years ago. He is closely connected with many aristocratic Irish families. His eldest son is married to the daughter of Lord and Lady Arthur Hill.—Yours ever,

CLARE.

These are the other recipes for hare that I promised you. The little bunnies are unusually good just now, with such a variety of victualling as the open weather gives them:—

Baron of Hare.—Cut the legs and back of a skinned hare close to the shoulders, and truss it into a neat shape; remove the tough skin which will be found on the back, and lard the fillet part with strips of bacon; cover with a well-greased paper and put it into the baking-tin (a "Household Roaster" is excellent) with ½ pint of sour cream and two tablespoonfuls of vinegar. Roast three-quarters of an hour, then remove the top and the paper to dry the larding, pour off the gravy, remove the fat, and mix it with a little reduced brown sauce, adding a spoonful of red currant jelly, a glass of claret, and a squeeze of lemon juice. At the moment of serving stir in the blood of the hare. Serve the sauce separately.

Jugged Hare.—Cut a skinned hare into neat joints, and sautez them in a stewpan with a sliced onion and about 2 ozs. of butter. When the flesh is set, put it into a large jar with two glasses of port and cover closely for ten minutes, that the meat may absorb the wine, then add a dozen small blanched onions, two slices of bacon cut in small pieces, half a small pot of red currant jelly, a bouquet of herbs, half a blade of mace, two cloves, and sufficient stock to cover the meat; cover the jar and simmer it, either in a covered stewpan or in the oven, for two hours, then pour off the gravy, thicken it with butter and flour, and after boiling it strain it again to the hare. At the moment of serving stir in the blood, and serve all very hot, with red currant jelly handed separately.

Potato Rôti.—Cut some potatoes in thin slices into cold water, and let them soak for a time. Put a piece of butter or dripping into an enamelled stew-pan; put in the potatoes, letting some water go in as well; salt them and cover them with lid. When they are cooked through stir them well and move the pan to the side to cook more slowly. Then stir the potatoes well again, mashing them into the shape of the stew-pan. When they are nearly cooked enough turn the pan upside down, letting the cake of potatoes rest on the lid, and slip it back into the pan the other way up; this browns both sides equally. Serve them very hot.

This is a nice way of cooking potatoes much used in Switzerland. It makes a good supper dish.

Méringues Filled with Russian Cream.—The Méringues: Beat the whites of four eggs to a frothy snow, then carefully dust in four tablespoonfuls of fine castor sugar. Form the mixture into shape of tablespoons and lay them upon sugared paper. Set them in a cool oven to dry. When ready, fill half of them with this cream. Russian Cream: Half a pint of cream, the juice of a large lemon, sweetened to fancy. Beat the cream to a strong froth and flavour it with vanilla.

"A.B."

("ABLE-BODIED.")

By Burke Bryson.

MANY and wonderful are the combinations of letters which, by affixing them to their names, men seek dignity and distinction—K.C.M.G., G.C.V.O., LL.D., and all the rest of them. They look very imposing, no doubt, but what can rival, in dignity or worth, those two letters "A.B.," which are used to proclaim our seamen "able-bodied"?

"Able-bodied." I would rather possess that order of natural honour than all the courtly titles in the world!

I am brought to think (and write) of "A.B.s" chiefly as the result of meeting an old friend, whom I had not seen since he joined the Navy, some fifteen years since. He wears a gold-laced uniform now, and doubtless holds rank of some desirable sort; but it was not that that aroused my interest and admiration. Rather was it the dignity of "A.B." which was written large all over his manly, stalwart frame and his open, healthy face. "Able-bodied," if ever seaman was.

A Worthy Ambition.

I left him with the feeling that it would be well if more of us had ambition to be classed "A.B."—to become worthy citizens of the Greatest Empire—to be Britons in that full sense of that ancient and glorious name. Ah, me! we are sadly fallen away from those times when the name "Briton" conjured up a stalwart, healthy, and sturdy representative of the race. Our traditional pride in manly strength is fast fading. And yet——

And yet it should not be so. Under modern conditions of life there is unquestionably much to account for the present degeneracy of health; but, equally so, there is much which should make for the maintenance of the traditional physique of the nation. Never has mankind been so fully equipped with both the knowledge and the means to get and to keep health

No—it is not the fault of Science or Civilisation. They have made it possible for every man, and every woman too, to write "A.B." after their names—if they had the will. But, alack! they have not the will.

There is the truth of the matter. People do not—despite the newspaper crusade in the Cause of Physical Fitness—people do not, or will not, take that amount of interest in themselves requisite to their bodily well-being.

The Most Glorious Thing in Life.

Men and women will spend a lifetime in striving for riches and honours; yet scorn to devote any fraction of their time or thought to the lengthening and perfecting of their lives. One would suppose this—the more vital matter—would naturally be placed first, but no. We rarely trouble our heads about the welfare of our bodies until some more than usually acute pain or ache obliges us to seek out the nearest doctor, and, helplessly, place our poor neglected bodies under his care.

To be "able-bodied" is a glorious thing; perhaps the most glorious thing in life. The "A.B." man, or woman, alone is able to enter wholly into all the joys and pleasures of living—able to enter enthusiastically into social duties or business and professional work—able almost to command success in every sphere of activity.

It requires no great power of reflection or reasoning to appreciate how much a successful man or woman owes that success to a freedom from the weaknesses and debilities which afflict so great a proportion of present-day workers in office, shop, and study.

Self-Forged Fetters.

What chance does the man possess whose every hour is made wretched by dyspepsia or nervous headache, for instance, against the man who is free to devote his whole thought and his whole energy to the problems of his work or study? It is a case of a fettered man against an unfettered; the former has no chance.

Yet so it is; one half of the population (or more) live in fetters of their own making, attempting to succeed in competition with the physically fit. It is too unequal a contest to be adjusted by resort to pills and medicines.

The Necessity for Physical Regeneration.

The evil lies deep, and the remedy must be radical. Not physical tinkering, but physical regeneration, is what is required—such regeneration as proper training and exercise can, and does, result in. Few modern achievements, whether of scientific research or of invention, or discovery, are worthy to rank higher than the success attained by Mr. Sandow in his attempts to teach debilitated and ailing humanity to strengthen the foundation of health from within.

Too often people are apt to regard everything associated with Mr. Sandow's name as "something to do with strong men and weight-lifting." No mistake could be more absurd, as anybody might learn from the notices of Mr. Sandow's success which appear from time to time in the Press. It is Mr. Sandow's ambition to enable every man and woman to write after their names the title of honour which stands at the head of this article—"Able-bodied."

The chronic dyspeptic, the livery subject, the nervous sufferer, the neurasthenic, the hysterical, the sufferer from obesity, the prematurely debilitated—these, and every type of physically unfit, are the men and women whom Mr. Sandow wishes to interest in themselves, and to teach them how to accomplish their own physical salvation independently of drugs and quackery.

Legislation for Health.

When I reflect upon what Mr. Sandow has accomplished in this direction, and how much remains to be accomplished before this generation can regard itself as a worthy successor to many hale and hearty generations of Britons which have preceded it, I sigh for legislative power—dictatorial power—that I might publish an Ordinance of Health making it a public duty for every citizen and citizeness to procure and diligently study that one of the little books in Mr. Sandow's "Library of Health" which deals with their own condition—acquiring thereby that first-hand knowledge of himself or herself which modern conditions render it so desirable he or she should possess.

And I would further make it the law of the land that physical unfitness should be regarded as an offence against the traditions, the welfare, and the vital interests of that Greatest Empire whose present wealth, strength, and pre-eminence was made and secured by men and women who, whatever their rank or condition, were first and foremost "A.B."

SPECIAL NOTICE.

As pointed out by Mr. Burke Bryson in the foregoing article, Mr. Sandow's ambition is to enable every man and every woman to write after their names the title of honour which heads the article, "A.B."—able-bodied.

Mr. Sandow's system of Curative Physical Culture has, by virtue of the remarkable success it has and is constantly achieving, become recognised by Medical Men all over the world. The system is founded upon Nature's Laws; it is medicineless and does not impose irksome restrictions as to diet. Already Mr. Sandow has passed as "A.B." thousands who, when they sought his advice, were little more than physical wrecks. By following the advice given, their lives have been transformed from one of constant gloom to one radiant with all the joys inseparable from health and vigour. They are now able to take a prominent position in the battle of life, and to win that success which, without vigour, energy, good health, and spirits, would be denied them.

This being so it is eminently desirable that all who suffer from enfeebled health and are deprived of not only many of the pleasures of life but also from achieving that means of success which with good health would be theirs—such should investigate the possibilities of the Science of Curative Physical Culture for themselves. So desirable, in fact, that arrangements have been made whereby readers of Truth can, by calling at the Sandow Institute, 32, St. James' Street, London, S.W., secure a consultation on their health without obligation to take treatment; whilst those unable to call can, by writing to Mr. Sandow, obtain free a copy of any of the volumes of Mr. Sandow's Health Library which deals with their particular ailment, and also a personal letter of advice from Mr. Sandow. Therefore all readers who do not enjoy perfect health should at once take advantage of the present opportunity and call or write to-day, mentioning this offer in Truth, to Mr. Sandow, 32, St. James' Street, London, S.W.

The volumes in Mr. Sandow's Health Library are as follows:—

By MAY SINCLAIR.

Mr. JAMES DOUGLAS writes:—"If 'The Creators' had been written by Henry James or George Meredith it would be hailed as a masterpiece of comedy."

THE OBSERVER.—"The book is thoughtful and sincere, and contains a whole gallery of finished and individual portraits."

JIM OF THE RANGES

By G. B. LANCASTER.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Many dramatic incidents, vivid and enthralling, bids us recommend this book to all who love a story big with adventure."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"A fine book, belonging, for its power of catching the atmosphere of wild places, to the same class of novels as Mrs. Robins' 'Magnetic North.'"

ENCHANTED GROUND

By HARRY JAMES SMITH.

MANCHESTER COURIER.—"The book is well written and the characters throughout stand out clearly."

DUNDEE ADVERTISER.—"The name of Harry James Smith is new to me, but I shall keep it in mind. For this novel is admirably written with an individual style and view."

LAND OF HIS FATHERS — A. J. Dawson

THE TIMES.—"Very brightly and well written . . . full of life and character."

JOHN WINTERBOURNE'S FAMILY — Alice Brown

QUEER STORIES

FROM

"TRUTH."

3rd EDITION. 3rd EDITION.

The Justice of this Criticism is fully borne out by the following Extracts from Reviews of this Latest Volume:

SCOTSMAN.—"Have long enjoyed well-deserved favour."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"A selection from this well known and deservedly popular feature in our popular contemporary. All its stories are wide awake."

REFEREE.—"It contains thirty stories, all of which are interesting, and some of which are very good indeed."

THE JEWISH WORLD.—"A splendid exchange for a shilling."

WESTERN DAILY PRESS.—"Very engrossing. They are 'queer' stories in that practically every one ends in an unexpected way, and contains a good surprise."

BAZAAR.—"This latest series should have as large a circulation as those which have preceded it."

SPORTSMAN.—"We need not commend them; they are well known to be entertaining."

ULSTER GUARDIAN.—"There are no short stories to compare with those which appear weekly in TRUTH, and we cannot think of a better shillingsworth of holiday fiction than one of the volumes. . . . . which contain thirty of the brightest and best of these famous stories."

SUSSEX DAILY NEWS.—"A brilliant shillingsworth. Practically every one of the thirty stories it contains is of much more than ordinary interest. They are of that happy magnetism which compels the reading of the whole story once the first page has been scanned."

WORCESTER HERALD.—"Brighter reading for the railway carriage or the odd half-hour anywhere cannot be found."

Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Company, Limited.

(Registered in the Transvaal.)

REPORT OF DIRECTORS.

To be submitted to the Shareholders at a Meeting to be held in the Board Room, Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Company, Limited, Consolidated Building, Fox Street, Johannesburg, on Thursday, the 13th day of October, 1910, at 11.30 a.m.

The Directors submit herewith the Balance Sheet and Profit and Loss Account of the Company for the year ended 30th June, 1910.

As reflected in the Profit and Loss Account, the net profits of the Company during the year amount to £406,181 18s 7d, which together with £162,609 6s 5d brought forward from the previous year, make a total available profit balance of £568,791 5s 0d.

A dividend of 10 per cent. for the Company's financial year ended 30th June last was declared on the 23rd June, which absorbs £395,000, leaving £173,791 5s 0d to be carried forward to the next account.

The Directors have followed their usual practice of writing down the Company's shareholdings to market values or under as at the 30th June. Their current value is very largely in excess of the amount at which they stand in the Balance Sheet.

The financial position remains one of great strength, the liquid cash assets exceeding the liabilities by the sum of £1,040,885 3s 3d.

During the greater portion of the year under review, the South African market conditions have not been favourable, which fact has somewhat limited the scope of the Company's operations in that direction.

The Directors have to record with great regret the recent adverse reports received from the Company's Consulting Engineer in respect of the New Rietfontein property. Notwithstanding the known irregularity of the reef formation of this Mine, it was not anticipated that the main dyke found in the eastern section would extend to the central and western workings. The Mine is at present being investigated by Professor Lawn, who has just entered the Company's service as Consulting Engineer. In the meantime, it has been considered prudent to reduce the book valuation of the shareholding in this Company to a low figure.

The results from the other producing Mines continue satisfactory. Full reports of their operations are periodically published, and it is therefore not necessary to go further into detail in this report.

The group of Mines with which this Company is associated has, during the year, produced gold to the aggregate value of £2,164,061.

The most important Rand flotations during the year under review have been the Government Areas on the Farm Modderfontein, a compact block of 2,633 claims, also the amalgamation of the Cinderella Deep property with a large number of claims on the Farm Leeuwpoort, under the title of the Cinderella Consolidated Gold Mines, Limited, which property now consists of 2,092 claims. The Directors are pleased to report that they have obtained a large interest in both these Companies on very favourable terms. In the case of the former this Company has been appointed its Agents, both in London and Johannesburg, and its mining operations will be conducted through the Company's Engineering Department.

Other Mines in the development stage in which this Company is largely interested are the Consolidated Langlaagte Mines and the Van Ryn Deep, operations on which are showing very gratifying results. Although the former has been a producing Mine for some considerable time, the deep level claims of the property are in course of development, and the assays obtained from these claims are very satisfactory. New machinery is being erected, which, when completed, should very largely increase the profits at present being earned.

The Company is also interested in the Randfontein Deep, where the sinking of the shafts is proceeding satisfactorily.

The interests above referred to make effective provision for maintaining and increasing the Company's mining revenue in future years.

In their last Report, the Directors were able to record a decided improvement in the returns of the Carlton Hotel, Johannesburg, and they are pleased upon this occasion to state that this improvement has been more than maintained.

The general conditions as regards property in Johannesburg, where the Company has large interests in buildings and land, have shown distinct signs of improvement during the year under review. There has been a good demand for building sites, which has enabled the Company to do an increased business in this department.

In consequence of Mr J. H. Johns' decision to give up active work, it has been necessary for the Company to appoint a successor to his office of Consulting Engineer. The Board have been fortunate in securing the services of Professor Lawn, whose qualifications and experience are well known in the mining world.

In terms of the Articles of Association, four of the Directors, viz: Sir Robert Baxter Llewelyn, K.C.M.G., Mr Charles Marx, Mr John Munro, and Mr H. A. Rogers, retire by rotation, and offer themselves for re-election.

Messrs J. P. O'Reilly and Henry Hains, the Auditors of the Company in Johannesburg, and Messrs Chatteris Nichols & Co., the Auditors in London, retire from Office, and offer themselves for re-election.

By Order of the Board,

THOMAS HONEY, London Secretary.

London, 1st October, 1910.

Madeira-Mamoré Railway Company.

AUTHORISED BOND ISSUE—£3,000,000 6 PER CENT. FIRST MORTGAGE 60-YEAR BONDS, of which £1,800,000 have been purchased, as to £900,000 by the Port of Pará and as to £900,000 by the Brazil Railway Company, who have agreed to finance the construction of the Madeira-Mamoré Railway, in order to provide the difference between the cost thereof and about £2,700,000 contributed by the Federal Government of Brazil under the provisions of its contract for building the railway.

Issue of £450,000 6 per cent. First Mortgage 60-Year Bonds (part of the authorised issue purchased by the Port of Pará as above mentioned), guaranteed as to principal and interest by the Port of Pará, and convertible on any interest date up to and including the 1st April, 1916, at the holder's option into the 6 per cent. Participating Preferred Stock of the Port of Pará at par at the parity of Exchange.

THE BANK OF SCOTLAND AND THE MANCHESTER AND LIVERPOOL DISTRICT BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED, are authorised to receive subscriptions on behalf of the Port of Pará for the £450,000 6 per Cent. First Mortgage 60-Year Bonds Guaranteed and Convertible as above mentioned, at the price of 92½ per cent., payable as follows:—

|---|---|
| £5 | 0s on Application |
| £17 | 10s ,, Allotment. |
| £35 | 0s ,, 15th November, 1910. |
| £35 | 0s ,, 15th December, 1910. |
| £92 | 10s per £100 Bond. |

or the whole may be paid up on allotment or on any Tuesday up to the 15th day of November, 1910, under discount at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

Interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum will be charged on overdue instalments.

A full half-year's interest coupon in respect of the Bonds now offered for subscription will be paid on 1st April, 1911.

The Issue of £3,000,000 6 per Cent. First Mortgage 60-Year Bonds of the Madeira-Mamoré Railway Company is secured by a Deed of Trust in favour of the Empire Trust Company of New York, U.S.A., as Trustee, dated 1st October, 1910. The Bonds are secured by a mortgage pledge on the lease of the Madeira-Mamoré Railway granted to the Company by the Federal Government of Brazil in pursuance of Decree No. 7,344 of 25th February, 1910, and on the concession granted by the Government of the State of Matto Grosso for the development of the resources of 1,000 square miles of land adjacent to the Railway, and also by a specific first charge on all immovable property, real and personal, which the Company may hereafter acquire with Bonds, forming part of the said issue, and also by a general floating charge on all the assets and property of the Company. The Bond issue may, under the provisions of the Deed of Trust, be increased for the specific purposes therein mentioned.

The Bonds will be dated the 1st October, 1910, and are redeemable at par on the 1st October, 1970, by means of annual payments commencing 1st October, 1915, to be applied in annual drawings at par or by purchase of the Bonds on the market or by tender if they are at or below that price, or the whole or any part may be redeemed at 102 per cent. at any time on six months' notice, or on the Company going into voluntary liquidation, or amalgamating with any other company or companies.

The Bonds are to bearer, but can be registered as to principal at the holder's option in London at the Company's Office.

The interest on the Bonds will be payable half-yearly on 1st April and 1st October by means of coupons attached to the Bonds.

The following information inter alia is supplied by the President of the Madeira-Mamoré Railway Company and of the Port of Pará:—

Railway and Lease.—The Madeira-Mamoré Railway Company is constructing a railway of 210 miles round the series of cataracts and rapids on the Madeira and Mamoré Rivers, the most important affluents of the Amazon, for account of the Brazilian Government, which contributes about £2,700,000 towards the construction of the railway, and has granted to the Madeira-Mamoré Railway Company a lease for the operation thereof for sixty years in consideration of receiving a percentage of the gross annual revenue, varying from 5 per cent. until 31st December, 1931, 10 per cent. from that date to 31st December, 1951, and 20 per cent. thereafter until 31st December, 1971, and 20 per cent. of the part of the net revenue of the Company which exceeds 12 per cent. on its capital as defined by the lease, but the Government does not receive any interest on or other return in respect of the £2,700,000.

The railway will connect the navigation of the Amazon and Madeira Rivers below the Madeira Falls with the 2,500 miles of navigation in Bolivia above these falls, thereby providing a quicker and cheaper route, viâ Pará, for the transport to Europe of the valuable export products of Bolivia.

Territory Served.—The Madeira River is the natural means of communication between the Amazon and the interior country, comprising over one-third of the area of Bolivia, and also for part of the Acre territory and of the State of Matto Grosso, which form part of the Republic of Brazil. These lands, covering over 475,000 square miles, are rich in tropical products of all kinds, with extensive herds of cattle, and with valuable minerals; they are intersected by numerous navigable rivers which all flow into the Madeira River and form a system of transportation extending to several thousand miles. This system of transportation has been hampered in the past owing to the existence of a series of dangerous rapids, for a distance of 210 miles along the rivers, which prevented navigation for that distance except by canoes, which only the Indians were able to handle under incredible difficulties and at great risk and loss of life and merchandise, this latter loss averaging about 20 per cent.

Construction.—The first section of the Railway, consisting of 55 miles, between Porto Velho de Santo Antonio and Jaci-Paraná, was put into operation in June, 1910; rails have since been laid over a further 32 miles, and it is anticipated that the River Mutum-Paraná, at mile 109, will be reached by the end of this year.

Operation.—Although Jaci-Paraná, the terminus of the section already in operation, is virgin forest, and although, in order not to interfere with the work, the operation is confined to one single train per week in each direction, the traffic already gives very satisfactory returns, as each train brings in on an average for the round trip £560—i.e., £29,120 per annum. When the line is opened to Mutum-Paraná—an important point on the present canoe navigation—the traffic should increase considerably, and it is estimated that the gross receipts from the operation of the line to this point should from the commencement be at least £90,000 per year.

The Indians take one month for the down trip and six weeks for the up trip in order to cross the rapids as far as Villa Bella; the railway will permit of this same journey being accomplished in one day. The present transportation charges for the journey are practically prohibitive, amounting to £6 per ton coming down and £80 going up river; these will be reduced by over 50 per cent. by the Railway Company's tariff, and the present large loss of life and merchandise will be avoided.

The traffic from the interior is already of such importance that the transportation charges paid on goods yield about £500,000 per annum.

Mr Louis Edgar Sanceau, who till lately, and for six years, was a representative of the Booth Steamship Line at Iquitos in the Amazon, recently made an expedition to La Paz Bolivia, and through the Rivers Beni, Mamoré, and Madeira. He confirms the above statements as to the great resources of the country, and makes the following estimate of the earnings therefrom in the immediate future:—

Taking as a basis the existing export and import traffic of the basin tributary to the Madeira-Mamoré Railway, and by applying the rates approved by the Federal Government, the revenue from the railway when it commences to operate from Villa Bella at the confluence of the Beni River, about the commencement of 1912, will be (at the exchange rate of 16d)*:—

|---|---|---|
| Revenue.—15,000 tons freight to and from— | | |
| Jaci-Paraná Abuna and Villa Bella | | £375,000 |
| Operating expenses | £125,000 | |
| Government Percentage | 18,750 | |
| | | 143,750 |
| Net Revenue | | 231,250 |

and two years after the entire railway is placed in operation about the end of 1912 the net annual revenue should be over £550,000.

The said net revenue of £231,250 will provide the annual fixed charges in respect of the said £1,800,000 of Bonds of the Company, and leave a surplus of £123,250, irrespective of the guarantee of the Port of Pará.

Land Concession.—The Company also owns a concession from the State of Matto Grosso for the development of the agricultural and mineral resources of more than 1,000 square miles of land adjacent to the Madeira-Mamoré Railway. This land is covered by immense forests of the best Pará Rubber, and is rich in gold.

Port of Pará—Conversion Rights.—The business of the Port of Pará, at the mouth of the Amazon, will be greatly augmented by the traffic which the Madeira-Mamoré Railway will create. The Port Company has purchased £900,000 6 per cent. first mortgage 60-Year bonds of the Madeira-Mamoré Railway Company and has decided to sell such bonds, and is now offering for sale £450,000 thereof, on which it will endorse its guarantee and give the holders thereof the option of converting the same at any interest date up to the 1st April, 1916, at the holder's option, into 6 per cent. participating preferred stock of the Port of Pará at par at the parity of exchange.

Port of Pará Revenue.—The receipts up to the present from the portion of the Port Works which have already been put in operation enables the Board to estimate that the net earnings from operation for the half-year ending December, 1910, will amount to about £87,000. In 1911 the net earnings should amount for that year to £273,000 at exchange of 16d,* which is sufficient to provide the service of the annual fixed charges of the Port of Pará and the interest, viz., £27,000, on the Bonds of the Madeira-Mamoré Railway Company, now offered for sale, and leave a substantial surplus.

The works of the port now under construction should be nearly finished at the end of 1911, and should be entirely completed before the end of 1912, when the net revenue will, it is estimated, be (at the exchange of 16d*) about £400,000.

An official quotation on the London Stock Exchange will be applied for in due course.

A brokerage of one-quarter per cent. will be paid on accepted applications bearing a broker's or a banker's stamp.

Full Prospectuses, upon the terms of which application will alone be received, and Forms of Application can be obtained of the Bank of Scotland Head Office, Edinburgh, and 19 Bishopsgate street Within, London; of the Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Company, Limited, 75 Cornhill, London; of the Head Office, Manchester; of Liverpool; and of the other branches of the respective banks; at the London Office of the Company, 28 Bishopsgate street Within, London; and of Messrs Kitcat and Aitken, 120 Bishopsgate street Within, E.C., the Brokers to the Issue.

*The Exchange is now 17¾d.

[Applications for the Bonds may be made on the Form printed below.]

"TRUTH" DOLL AND TOY SHOW.

PRELIMINARY NOTICE.

It seems early days yet to be reminding my readers of an event which is still some months ahead. But the fact that a large number of dolls are still crying aloud for clothes, impels me to direct the attention of TRUTH'S lady friends to their condition, and to the fact that they will be required for exhibition at the Albert Hall in the middle of December, prior to distribution among the London Poor Law Schools and Hospitals.

I hope that many ladies will take pity on the poor dolls, and forward their applications as soon as possible. The usual prizes for the dressing of the dolls will, of course, be awarded after the Show.

HOME-MADE TOYS.

The exhibits in this class last year did not come up to expectations. This year special efforts will be made to stimulate amateur toy-makers to take part in the Competition. With that object in view the Editor of TRUTH has decided (assuming the entries warrant it) to give a Special Prize for

HOME-MADE DOLLS' HOUSES,

in addition to the usual Prizes offered in the Home-Made Toys Class.

He desires me now to direct particular notice to this, as he is of opinion that the making of Dolls' Houses is an art in which amateur talent is likely to find congenial scope for its exercise. Moreover, a Dolls' House is a peculiarly serviceable sort of plaything for children, both because it is one in the delights of which several can share simultaneously, and also because it is better able to withstand the wear and tear of daily use than smaller and more fragile toys.

A further and more detailed announcement of the Show will appear in due course. Meanwhile, let readers of TRUTH make a careful note of the date, which is Wednesday and Thursday, December 14 and 15, 1910.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best EPIGRAM, CONUNDRUM, LIPOGRAM, BOUTS-RIMÉS, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a quarter to the same competitor.

7. ALL NEW CONTRIBUTORS ARE REQUIRED TO FORWARD WITH THEIR FIRST ANSWERS THEIR REAL NAMES AND ADDRESSES FOR REGISTRATION; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed twelve, and must under no circumstances consist of more than fourteen, letters.

9. COMPETITORS MUST ON NO ACCOUNT CHANGE THE NOMS-DE-PLUME THEY HAVE ONCE ASSUMED.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed:—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," CARTERET STREET, QUEEN ANNE'S GATE, S.W.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1,651.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered this week to that competitor who shall prove most successful in WRITING THE WORDS OF A TOPICAL SONG OF A HUMOROUS CHARACTER DEALING WITH SOME SUBJECT OR SUBJECTS OF UP-TO-DATE INTEREST.

N.B.—The song must be in rhymed verse and in some recognised metre Each verse should be followed by a refrain, which should, however, only be written out in full once.

Songs are limited to thirty lines—to include one full version of the refrain.

The introductory repetitions of the refrain, which may be set down after each verse, will not count in the thirty lines.

It only remains to add that all songs must reach TRUTH office not later than by the first post on Monday, October 17.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,645.

TEN LINE RHYMED ACROSTIC ODES, CELEBRATING THE FIRST DAY OF PATRIDGE SHOOTING.

The Prize of Two Guineas in this Competition is equally divided between KLONDYKE and ROUMANIAN, whose odes were printed in TRUTH of September 14 last.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name, with the address, of CRESCENDO, winner of £7 10s., in connection with the special advertisement competition is Harold H. Hull, Esq., Milford, Hare Lane, Claygate, Surrey.

 The real name, with the address, of VICTOR, winner of £1 in connection with above, is Miss Olivia Graham, Edmond Castle, Carlisle.

 The real name, with the address, of SKYLARK, also winner of £1 in connection with above, is Miss K. Briscoe, Symond's Down, Axminster.

SKYLARK asks me to hand over 10s. of the prize money to the TRUTH Toy Fund, for which I beg to thank her.

 The real name, with the address, of CHRIS, winner of TRUTH prize No. 1643, is C. L. Boden, Esq., Ecuador, Willow Avenue, Sandon Road, Birmingham.

 The real name, with the address, of BEN EZRA, winner of TRUTH prize No. 1644, is the Rev. F. G. Cole, Bilton Vicarage, Hull.

PHERITENE.—I do not usually discuss Prize awards, but when the question is one of fact and not of opinion there can be no objection to my doing so. I may as well inform you that your forecast was the last left in for comparison with that of CHRIS, and that, upon the figures being carefully compared, CHRIS was found to have the advantage of you to the extent of 7·37 points in respect of the percentage gained by the various counties. It is perfectly true that you gave more actually correct percentages than did CHRIS. But, unfortunately, where you did go wrong you went in several instances further wrong than he did. The result, in totting up the margin of errors in both your cases, works out as I have said. If you add up the differences between your forecast and the actual result, and having done the same with CHRIS's figures, then compare them with your own, I believe you will find I am correct.

RIAM.—I beg to thank you for your explanatory letter, the contents of which I have duly noted.

ENTRE NOUS.

I MUST again appeal to the sympathies of lady readers of Truth on behalf of my large family of unclothed dolls. A good many have been taken off my hands since I last called attention to their distressing condition, but I have still nearly a thousand waiting for clothes. With the winter coming on, I naturally feel very anxious about them—the more so because they are all under an engagement to appear at the Albert Hall on December 14, after which they have to assist at the Christmas festivities of innumerable workhouse schools and hospitals in and about London. Most of those now on my hands are the ordinary small-sized dolls, which are easily provided with attractive costumes; but there also remain a few of the large dolls, which give greater scope for the taste and skill of their dressers, and also of the "natural" babies, who ought to become a very attractive novelty at this year's Toy Show. Any kind ladies who will take some of these waifs in hand will be supplied with them promptly if they will only signify their requirements.

A contemporary announced last week that "there is every probability of the Coronation taking place the week after Ascot races, which will next year last from June 13 to 18." As stated in Truth several months ago, the Coronation is to take place on Wednesday, June 21, that date having been long since privately fixed for the ceremony. The official "ceremonial" for the proceedings of the day will be the same as was drawn out for King Edward's Coronation.

---

The King had a successful deer drive in Ballochbuie Forest before leaving Balmoral, and on another day the extensive woodlands on the Birkhall estate were driven for roedeer. Ballochbuie, which comprises about 15,000 acres, lies two miles to the south-west of Balmoral, and it is bordered on the north by the Dee. The deer forest is fringed by beautiful woods, and Queen Victoria built a cottage, known as the Danzig Shiel, at a picturesque spot near the river. There are always plenty of deer on Ballochbuie, and the woods afford them excellent shelter. Queen Victoria purchased Ballochbuie about 1878 from the late Colonel Farquharson of Invercauld.

---

The Queen is to accompany the King on his visit to Sandringham next week, and it is expected that they will stay at York Cottage for ten days before proceeding to Windsor Castle. Her Majesty will go from Sandringham to Holkham, to visit the Duke and Duchess of Teck at the place belonging to Lord Leicester which is known as The Farmhouse.

---

It has been stated that the Ministers in attendance at Balmoral have made briefer stays than was formerly the case, because the King "is anxious to get into touch with as many members of the Government as possible." This is all a fiction. Each Minister has stayed at Balmoral for a week, which was the term of the last reign and usual in Queen Victoria's time, but her late Majesty sometimes arranged that Ministers who were in favour at Court should be put down for a ten days' or a fortnight's stay when the annual rota of such attendances was drawn up. Lord Beaconsfield only went once to Balmoral, which was in the autumn of 1868. He detested the place and the whole Court routine in Scotland. When he became Prime Minister in 1874 he excused himself from going to Balmoral again, and he did so without offending his sovereign.

The Royal yacht Victoria and Albert has returned to Portsmouth from Copenhagen, and she will be laid up for the winter. Queen Alexandra is to travel home overland when she returns to England next month. Her Majesty's plans have been very uncertain. She has given up her intended visit to Norway, but it is expected that she will spend a week or two with the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland at their seat in Upper Austria when she leaves Denmark.

Queen Amélie and her son are coming to England, and they will reside for some time at Wood Norton, the seat of the Duc d'Orléans. A paragraph has gone all round the Press which asserts that Queen Amélie has "a great affection" for Wood Norton, that place being "the home of her childhood." Balmoral might as reasonably be described as "the home of her childhood," for she has never been at Wood Norton, except for two or three brief visits. Wood Norton was the English residence of the late Duc d'Aumale, but the Comte and Comtesse de Paris and their family never lived there. As to Queen Amélie's childhood, it was mostly spent in France at Château d'Eu.

Some of the papers have stated that Queen Amélie's fortune "has been transferred from Portugal" during the last few weeks. A great deal of Royal property has no doubt been "transferred from Portugal" since King Manuel ascended the throne, but the large fortune which Queen Amélie inherited from her father, the Comte de Paris, has always been invested in England and in France. It is unnecessary for the papers to speculate as to the place which King Manuel and Queen Amélie will assume "in Court circles" if they come to England. It has always been the custom for exiled Royalties to live in privacy, and they do not figure prominently "in Court circles," and are never seen at State ceremonials. The presence of exiled Royalties on public occasions along with members of the Royal Family would lead to all kinds of vexatious tracasseries in connection with precedence, involving both Princes, Princesses, and the Ambassadors.

I learn on the best authority that the health of the Tsaritza continues in a very unsatisfactory condition. She suffers from what her own physicians call melancholia. She was so ill that lately it was quite impossible to arouse her for several days. Her entourage are very depressed.

Prince and Princess Alexander of Teck are going to Ireland shortly after their return from Germany on a visit to Mr. and Mrs. William Naper at Lough Crew, co. Meath. Mrs. Naper is a daughter of the late Colonel and Lady Mary Trefusis, and a niece of the Duke of Buccleuch.

Prince Arthur of Connaught was last week on a visit to the Duke of Richmond and Gordon at Gordon Castle. His Royal Highness fished the Spey daily, but he had poor sport, as the river was not in good ply. The first day the celebrated Upper Quarry pool was drawn blank, and the second day Prince Arthur went to the Rake pool, where he hooked three salmon, but they all escaped.

Princess Marie Louise of Schleswig-Holstein has been staying during the last week at Orwell Park, Suffolk, on a visit to Captain and Lady Beatrice Pretyman. Orwell Park is beautifully situated on the estuary of the Orwell, a few miles below Ipswich. There are most attractive gardens and grounds and a richly wooded and very picturesque park. The house contains the magnificent collection of old masters which was formed in the thirties of the last century by Mr. Tomlin, son of the Bishop of Winchester. King George and Queen Mary (then Prince and Princess of Wales) spent a week at Orwell Park three or four years ago. The estate, which is a very large one, affords some of the best shooting in East Anglia.

The Grand Duchess Vladimir, who went to Venice after her "cure" at Contrexéville, is now staying at Tegernsee, on a visit to her sister-in-law, the Duchess Dowager of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. The Grand Duke Cyril Vladimirovitch and the Grand Duchess are also at Tegernsee, and Princess Nicholas of Greece (who left Bognor last week for Paris) is expected there shortly. Princess Nicholas is the Grand Duchess Helena Vladimirovna.

Prince Henry XXIV., of Reuss-Köstritz, died last week at Schloss Ernstbrunn, his seat in Lower Austria. He was head of one of the younger branches of the Reuss family, all the members of which bear the name of Henry in honour of their ancestor, the Emperor Henry IV. He succeeded his father in the extensive family estates in 1894. He took no prominent part in public affairs. The Queen of Bulgaria is his sister.

My Dublin correspondent writes:—

The Chief Secretary and Mrs. Birrell were favoured with beautiful weather in taking up their residence last month at the official residence in the Phœnix Park. The situation is a breezy, bracing one, with extensive views, bounded by the distant mountain ranges of Dublin and Wicklow. The Chief Secretary's visits to Ireland are busy ones, and the breeziness is not all confined to the weather. Mr. Birrell cannot complain of any want of willing hands, official and otherwise, to help his government of Ireland, nor of any stint in a generous outpouring of instruction and advice regarding the intricacies of the Irish question. No doubt there is wisdom in a multitude of counsellors, but he was a patient man who found counsel darkened by words. Mr. and Mrs. Birrell gave dinner parties during the week, entertaining, amongst others, Lord O'Brien and the Hon. G. O'Brien, Lord Hemphill, and many leading officials.

Two distinguished Irishmen in different walks of life visited Dublin last week, and were warmly received. Mr. John McCormack had his first "send off" in Dublin, which takes what might be called personal pride, in his musical and dramatic success in the great world beyond the island of his birth. Mr. Bernard Shaw made his first public appearance in the Irish capital—a characteristic one. After a tour in many of the wild and picturesque regions of Ireland he returned to the capital and delivered a lecture on Poor Law reform—thoroughly practical and utilitarian, too, but with a leaven of humour that helped it to "slither down asy." Whilst none deny the urgent need of Poor Law reform in Ireland, it never seems to get any nearer to reform. If anything useful comes of Mr. Shaw's meeting and address he will have done more than anyone before him. Year after year innumerable meetings on Poor Law reform and like matters have ended, and ended for good, in a vote of thanks to the chairman, just as in Mr. Shaw's case.

Lord Dunsany's lately published book shows that he is amongst the rare number who can dream dreams and triumph over their environment. His family residence is in unromantic Meath, of hunting renown, and he is not of Celtic but of Danish descent. The Plunkett family—of one branch of which he is the head—belong to the race whom the great King Brian conquered at the battle of Clontarf. They seem to have made a good thing, later on, out of being conquered. Five of the branches of the family are at present in possession of separate peerages, with nothing very particular in the way of historic distinction to show for them. The last branch to be ennobled was that of Lord Chancellor Plunket. It now has two peerages to its credit, Lord Rathmore, the latest creation, being the present Lord Plunket's uncle. To make a distinction, no doubt, amongst the peers, "jostling one another" in the family, like the salmon in the Galway river, Lord Plunket's branch dispenses with the double letter at the end of the name. Sir Horace Plunkett belongs to the Dunsany family, and may possibly some day add a sixth to the family peerages, if he be so minded.

Lady Dunraven's severe illness causes much regret in Ireland, especially in Limerick, where the Dunraven family have always lived much at Adare Manor and been very popular. The Quinns are an old Irish family, and have always had "a way with them" of getting on with their people. Lord Plunket has not been very well since he returned from New Zealand. He has been living at the family residence, Old Connaught, near Bray, where Lady Plunket's mother, the Dowager Lady Dufferin-Ava, and Lady Hermione Blackwood have been staying. Lady Hermione is a charming and clever lady, Lady Dufferin's only unmarried daughter. She has had the training of a professional nurse and done much benevolent work amongst the people in the Clandeboye neighbourhood, besides taking an active part in organising nursing of the poor throughout Ireland.

Sir Alan Johnstone, who has been appointed Minister at The Hague, has been stationed at Copenhagen for five years. He entered the Diplomatic Service in 1879, and served successively at Vienna, Washington, Belgrade, The Hague, and Rome. He is a younger son of Lord Derwent. The Legation at Copenhagen has been for many years a certain stepping-stone to promotion.

---

Lady Lucan, who died last Wednesday at Laleham House, was the youngest sister of the late Duke of Richmond and Gordon, and (through her mother) a granddaughter of the "Waterloo" Marquis of Anglesey. Lady Lucan was a great favourite in society, and she interested herself most actively and usefully in practical philanthropic work both in England and in Ireland. She established manufactures of Irish homespun tweed in Mayo, which gave employment to the peasantry, and she seized every opportunity of advocating the industry and recommending the product when staying in England or Scotland.

Lord Borthwick, who died last week at the early age of forty-three, was the head of a very ancient and highly distinguished Scotch family. The Barony of Borthwick, which dates from 1452, was dormant for a considerable period, but the claim of the late peer's father was admitted by the House of Lords in 1870. He descended from a younger son of the third Baron, who was killed at Flodden Field. Lord Borthwick was a partner in a stockbroking firm which had been founded by his father. He devoted most of his time to business, and seldom visited his estates in Wigtownshire. He was a man of high culture and an accomplished musician, as well as an excellent shot. He had been a representative peer for Scotland since 1906, and he was a member of the Royal Company of Archers.

---

One of the papers states, in referring to Lord Borthwick, that the late Lord Glenesk "was of the same family." Lord Glenesk bore their name, but he had no more connection with the true Borthwick stock than with the Hapsburgs. His father—the well-known Peter Borthwick—was the son of an agricultural labourer, who worked all his life on a farm in Midlothian. "Peter" was clever, enterprising, and a great "pusher." He became a member of the House of Commons when still a comparatively young man, but his life was latterly embittered by pecuniary difficulties.

Mr. Pennant Pennant, of Bodfari, Flintshire, who died last week at Nantlys, his place near St. Asaph, was the representative of one of the most ancient families in Wales. The Pennants claim descent from Tudor Trevor, who flourished in the Principality more than a century before the Norman Conquest. Thomas Pennant, of Downing, the celebrated naturalist and traveller, had a son, who married twice (first a daughter of the fifth Duke of Marlborough, and secondly a daughter of the sixth Earl of Cardigan), but he left no issue. The large Pennant estates were, therefore, settled by Thomas Pennant upon his granddaughter, who married the eighth Earl of Denbigh, with reversion (if she left no children) to her cousin, Mr. Philip Pennant Pearson, who assumed the name of Pennant in 1853 on succeeding to the family property. The late Mr. Pennant was one of the most prominent public men in North Wales, and he took an active part in the county business of Flintshire. He was a keen and uncompromising Tory, and he several times contested Flintshire unsuccessfully. He was a staunch Churchman, and he will be much missed in the diocese of St. Asaph.

Mr. Alfred Bonham-Carter, who died last week at the age of eighty-six, was a son of the late Mr. John Bonham-Carter, who represented Portsmouth from 1816 until 1838. He assumed the name of Bonham in 1827 on succeeding to the large estates in Hampshire of his cousin, Mr. Thomas Bonham. He afterwards built a fine house on his East Hants property at Adhurst St. Mary, near Petersfield. Mr. Alfred Bonham-Carter held the office of Referee of Private Bills in the House of Commons for thirty-seven years, and he was justly regarded as one of the greatest authorities on Parliamentary practice.

---

Lord and Lady Derby have left their shooting quarters in Inverness-shire for the season, and they will be in constant residence at Knowsley Park about three months after the Newmarket Houghton Meeting. There is to be a large house party at Knowsley during the second week in November for the Liverpool autumn races at Aintree.

---

Sir Arthur and Lady Bigge have been staying during the last six weeks at Abergeldie Mains, which was placed at their disposal by the King. During the last few autumns Abergeldie Mains had been occupied by Prince and Princess Alexander of Teck, but they are abroad this year. When Lord Knollys resigns the office of private secretary to the King (which he has consented to hold until after the Coronation), Sir Arthur Bigge will succeed him in the occupation of the Winchester Tower at Windsor. This is a very good house, which was long the residence of the Inspector of the Castle, who was the chief of the Lord Chamberlain's permanent staff at Windsor. In 1895 Queen Victoria set apart the Winchester Tower as an official residence at Windsor of the principal private secretary of the Sovereign.

---

Lord and Lady Lansdowne will return in a few days to Bowood Park, after a stay of over two months at their place on the coast of Kerry. They will entertain a number of guests at Bowood during the next few weeks. They are to be at Lansdowne House for the autumn session, after which they will return to Bowood for the winter. During their stay in town they will pay visits to their Majesties at Windsor Castle and to the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire at Chatsworth.

Lord Fitzhardinge is to return next week to Berkeley Castle for the hunting season from Meikleour House, Lord Lansdowne's place in Perthshire, which he rented for the summer and autumn. Lord Fitzhardinge has landed several salmon and grilse from the Meikleour water in the Tay, which is one of the best autumn stretches on that river.

On the burning question of payment of members Mr. Balfour shapes—after a certain amount of moulding at the hands of the potter—pretty much as anticipated in these columns three weeks ago. He dislikes payment of members intensely. He, however, dislikes the reversal of the Osborne judgment by legislation still more. Like others who have to choose between two evils, he will accept the less. Mr. F. E. Smith, representing the "forwards" of the Unionist team, is quite satisfied with this, and has publicly patted his captain on the back. No doubt he is right. He knows his man.

The Unionists have lately been suffering from one of those spasms which periodically seize parties in Opposition. They manifest themselves in angry letters to the party papers, sarcastic allusions to the aloofness and inertia of the Front Bench, and the formation of cabals and movements for the purpose of giving the leaders a lead. The special movement which is being got up for Mr. Balfour's benefit is dubbed a "réveillé"—a particularly happy name. One cannot help being amused to see the commander-in-chief wake up, stretch himself, and assume a martial and energetic air at the call of the trumpet.

No doubt all Front Benches require a good rousing réveillé from time to time, and if I were in his camp I should often be tempted to blow loud and shrill in Mr. Balfour's ear while he is taking a nap. At the best he is not exactly an inspiring leader, and his elusiveness when bidden to toe a line must be very exasperating. He certainly did not cut much of a figure as a leader in office when confronted with difficulties in his own party. But I cannot see that any serious fault can be fairly found with his leading in Opposition. It must inevitably take a party many years to recover from such a knock-down blow as the Unionists received in 1906. The waiting game is the only one under such circumstances, and Mr. Balfour has played it in the only way possible.

I imagine it was by no wish of his that the party was plunged into the general election of last January. I give him credit for understanding that it was to the interest of the party that the life of the last Parliament should be prolonged to the latest possible moment. In the same way he probably appreciates now that he would have a far better chance of coming in with a working majority after the present Government has led a precarious existence for two or three years than at a general election next January on the House of Lords question. The impatient spirits who are now clamouring for declarations of more or less democratic policy for electioneering purposes belong to the same ring which was for throwing out the Budget a year ago and "damning the consequences." Mr. Balfour was quite right in reminding these stalwarts at Edinburgh that it is no business of the Opposition to propound in advance their own solution of problems which the Government is called upon to deal with. Every old Parliamentary hand knows the folly of such tactics. But, while pointing this out, Mr. Balfour nevertheless committed himself to a declaration of opinion on the payment of members question which cannot fail to be helpful to the Government. His worst fault as a leader is his readiness to allow his own hand to be forced by his partners.

---

It seems to be overlooked by both Liberal and Unionist advocates of payment of members as a solution of the Osborne judgment difficulty that this measure, if accompanied (as it certainly ought to be) by payment of returning officers' expenses out of public money, inevitably involves either the second ballot or some other means of dealing with the case of an election in which several candidates stand for the same seat. Unless these two measures are passed simultaneously, there is every probability that a large number of members will be returned at the next general election by minorities of the voters who go to the poll. This will reduce our representative system to a farce, and may easily result in the formation of a Ministry which has nothing like a mandate from a majority of the electors.

---

This possibility concerns the Liberals chiefly, who have more to fear than the Unionists from three-cornered or four-cornered contests. It is to be hoped that the Government will realise the danger before they commit themselves to passing payment of members at once. The truth is that this is only one of a whole budget of electoral reforms which are all urgently needed. Besides the second ballot, there is "one man one vote," registration by public authority and on a shorter qualifying period, and, still more, a wholesale redistribution of seats, which is many years overdue.

If we are to have another session of this Parliament, all these matters ought to be dealt with in one Bill or series of Bills. The only reason the House of Lords gave for throwing out the Plural Voting Bill in 1906 was that it ought to have been part of a general scheme of Parliamentary reform. Consequently, if such a scheme were presented, the Upper House is "estopped" by its own declarations from rejecting "one man one vote," and as it is likely to be on its best behaviour just at present, it is not likely to refuse to do now what it said it would do in 1906. To the Liberal and Labour parties this is by far the most important of all purely electoral reforms.

---

Portugal has long been on the brink of revolution, and the only matter for surprise to those who know the country is that the crisis has been deferred till now instead of ensuing on the assassination of King Carlos. For many years past the country has been one of the worst governed in Europe. Constitutional forms have done nothing for the people. The politicians, without distinction of party, were corrupt, and party government resolved itself into a question which rival gang of political bandits should have the privilege of plundering the people.

Popular resentment of government conducted on these principles has long been directed against the sovereign and his family, and not unjustly, for they have given no sign of desiring to improve the condition of the State, but, on the contrary, have connived at the prevailing abuses on condition that they themselves received a share of the profits. The only political aspiration which Dom Carlos ever manifested was to get his Civil List increased, and to ensure that he was paid punctually. One may feel sorry for his son, brought up in a bad school, called suddenly by a horrible crime to a position for which he had received no training, and suddenly set running for his life after a year or two's enjoyment of the sweets, and temptations, of kingship. But no one can say that the House of Braganza has not got what it deserved—what it has almost seemed to ask for.

What the future may have in store for the unfortunate Portuguese it is too early to conjecture. "This day," says the Proclamation of the Republic, "puts an end finally to the slavery of this country, and the beneficent aspiration of a régime of liberty rises luminous in its virgin essence." If grandiloquent phrases meant good government, how enviable would be the lot of the Latin races! The crop must depend on the soil as well as the seed. Liberty is a tender plant, and the conditions of public life in Portugal of late years are not precisely those in which virgin essences, however luminous at the moment, are likely to thrive and retain their virginity and luminosity.

At the same time, the Republic has begun better than might have been expected. The bloodshed inevitably incident to such a coup d'état does not seem to have been proportionate to the expenditure of powder. The revolutionary leaders have evinced a sincere desire to protect the persons of the King and his family and to facilitate their safe escape. There is no question that Senhor Braga is a man of high character and fine intellect. His record is that of an honest and unselfish patriot, and at least one of his colleagues in the Provisional Government has deservedly won the affection of his countrymen. If the country acquiesces in the change, and if the exiled monarch and his adherents will only accept the fait accompli, it is not beyond possibility that the events of last week may begin the political regeneration of Portugal.

The revolution at Lisbon has wrapped the Daily Chronicle in a blaze of journalistic glory. The voluminous descriptive accounts of the two days' fighting which Mr. Donohoe was able to get through to his paper last week make one of the smartest performances of the kind in newspaper annals—all the more worthy of credit because it is evident that the writer must have done his work at the risk of his life. I heard a man in the club say that the Chronicle was lucky to have its special correspondent on the spot. But why call it luck? The revolution has been in the air for some weeks, and presumably Mr. Donohoe was not sent to Lisbon by accident. The Chronicle well deserves its little boom. For a long time past it has been conducted with exceptional ability. It is always to the front with its news, and in general style and tone it is well above the average standard of halfpenny journalism.

A KING WITHOUT A CROWN.

Oh, cruel are the ways of Fate
With those who once incur her frown!
To-day he knows the exile's state
Who wore but yesterday a crown.

Too young was he himself, poor lad,
To earn or good or ill renown;
The guiltless heir to system bad,
He paid its debit with his crown.

By rottenness long undermined
The flimsy structure toppled down,
And, in its fall, to doom consigned
Its seeming figurehead, The Crown.

Yet Freedom's self, while glad to hear
The tidings from Lisboa's town,
Still mingles with her joy a tear
For Manuel, king without a crown.

An officer serving on a foreign station writes to me at some length on the "German Peril" apropos of recent articles in Truth. I am sorry to say that the only effect of his arguments, so far as I am concerned, is to show how very slender are the grounds on which we are bidden to arm and defend ourselves against the terrible Teuton. My military friend observes that when the German Emperor speaks of peace he means peace "on his own terms." Does any nation speak of peace on any other? The German Emperor has kept the peace on his own terms the best part of twenty years, and his terms have not troubled us. Why should we suppose that they are going to trouble us in future?

The writer sees an answer to this last question in an hypothesis that the Germans are bent on establishing "a great German empire overseas." He argues: They cannot hold such an empire so long as we are supreme at sea; therefore, our maritime supremacy must be challenged, and a collision between the two countries is "inevitable." On what grounds does this hypothesis rest? It seems to me mere gratuitous guessing. The Germans have possessed considerable colonies in Africa for many years past. They are not very flourishing, and are regarded by many Germans as a burden rather than a source of profit. Their existence has not hitherto been found incompatible with our naval supremacy. Where else is this overseas German Empire going to be founded? If in Asia or America there would be other naval powers to reckon with besides ourselves. It seems to me only one degree less than criminal to talk about war being inevitable between two countries on the strength of such fanciful speculations.

It was observed in one of my recent articles that Germany has recently entered into engagements with Russia, France, ourselves, and other Powers, for the preservation of the status quo on the Baltic and North Sea littorals. The military critic above referred to replies that what Austria did last year in the case of the Berlin Treaty proves that treaties have no binding force. Nonsense! The fact that no power thought it worth while to object seriously to what Austria did proves that the treaty had been practically abrogated by the mere effluxion of time and the change in the European situation. No treaty is intended to last for ever. They are made to meet special circumstances, and necessarily become obsolete as circumstances change. It is absurd to argue from this that a European Government would to-day enter into elaborate arrangements with its neighbours without having any intention of abiding by them. I only referred to the recent North Sea Treaty as an obvious answer to the contention that Germany is, and was at the time when she entered into that Treaty, bent on annexing the Low Countries.

It is argued that no possible blame can attach to us for the competition in naval armaments, because in 1908 our Government went to the furthest possible limit in the way of restricting its shipbuilding programme in order to show its pacific spirit, and Germany made no response. Is it really worth while answering this? The competition in armaments has been going on for years. We were building against France and Russia long before we took to building against Germany. We have always set the pace in shipbuilding. We gave a fresh impetus to it when we laid down the Dreadnought and completed her with a speed and secrecy which were calculated to alarm every power which had reason to fear the strength of our Navy. I have never said that the Germans are not to blame; on the contrary, I have said that they are as foolish as we are. It is a competition in folly. But to suggest that we are not to blame is silly.

The Australian population question, particularly in connection with the crowding of the cities and the lack of labour in the country districts, has been much discussed lately, but I have nowhere seen it dealt with more forcibly than in an extract from the Sydney Bulletin, which has just reached me. Commenting upon the frequent advertisements in which squatters and farmers intimate that they will employ only people "without encumbrance," the writer of the article says:—

> New South Wales assures the people of England that it wants population—not city folk, but country workers. They are coming in response to the invitation—and when they arrive they too often bring up against these alternatives:—(1) They may desert their children and thus qualify for a farm or station job; (2) They may murder their children and bury them secretly; (3) They may leave them with the baby farmer, which is merely alternative No. 2 over again. And as a consequence, these desirable settlers often find themselves stranded in the city and can go no further.

Besides producing all sorts of other evils this policy, of course, perpetuates the very dearth of labour in the country, which is continually bewailed by those whom the Sydney journal bluntly calls "the fool farmer and the squatting lunatic."

The famous Chasse de St. Louis, which is one of the finest examples of Limoges work in the world, has been purchased by Mr. Charles Wertheimer. This superb enamel has been on loan at the Victoria and Albert Museum, South Kensington, since 1873, when it was removed from Parham Park on the death of the late Lord Zouche. During the French Revolution the Chasse de St. Louis passed into the possession of William Beckford, and shortly before the Fonthill sale in 1822 it was privately purchased by Mr. Farquhar, who let it go at the sale of his collection in London a year afterwards for the ridiculous price of thirty-six guineas. It was bought by Anne Countess of Newburgh, who many years afterwards presented it to the late Lord Zouche. This reliquary is understood to have been sold to Mr. Wertheimer at a price exceeding £20,000.

A scheme has been set on foot through a monthly magazine for raising a "testimonial" to Charles Dickens by collecting a large sum of money for the benefit of his descendants. "Dickens Testimonial Stamps" are to be produced and sold, with a view to their being stuck into all the existing copies of his works, which are estimated to number twenty-four millions. The plea for this appeal to the generosity of a very large public is that the law of copyright did not enable Dickens to secure adequate provision for his descendants, some of whom have had to be relieved by Civil List pensions. As a matter of fact, Dickens made £70,000, and left a very respectable provision for his children, who have certainly not, in most cases, any need of public charity. The movement seems akin to an insult to the Dickens family, and is presumably the spontaneous effort of some foolish and misguided busybody. For this reason it is to be hoped that the public will not encourage it.

The Drapers' Company has offered to present Cambridge University with a physiological laboratory, which will cost nearly £25,000, including the fittings. The Company require the University to undertake the cost of maintenance, which is estimated at about £5,000. The Company has recently presented Oxford University with an electrical laboratory.

The Master of Christ's had long been a distinguished figure in Cambridge, and he was regarded with much respect and affection in his own college and by all his university colleagues. Since he took his degree in 1860, which he did after a distinguished career as an undergraduate, Dr. Peile's life has been entirely devoted to Cambridge, and his work there has been most valuable. A Liberal in more than the technical sense of the word, and an intimate friend of a group of distinguished dons, of whom Dr. Henry Sidgwick is the most widely known, he helped to inspire most of the reforms by which the University has profited during the last half-century. He governed his own college for twenty-three years with unfailing wisdom and tact. Outside Cambridge Dr. Peile was best known by his "Introduction to Greek and Latin Etymology," which was for many years the standard handbook of comparative philology, and gave a great impetus to this branch of literary study in England. With the progress of research, the book has long since passed out of date, as nobody recognised more frankly than its author. It was, indeed, characteristic of Dr. Peile to be always learning and always receptive of new ideas, and this trait largely contributed to his influence and his popularity both in his college and in the University.

I referred a week or two ago to the remarkable run of Church patronage with which Lord Loreburn has been favoured since he took possession of the Woolsack. Now another residentiary stall in Rochester Cathedral is placed at the Chancellor's disposal by the resignation (through ill health) of Canon E. B. Ottley, who was only appointed in 1907.

The late Canon Waller was one of the best known ecclesiastics in the diocese of Worcester, and for eighteen years he had been Proctor in Convocation for the clergy. He had held the rectory of Little Packington, near Coventry, for forty-six years. He was held in great esteem by the diocesan clergy, and Bishop Philpott had a high opinion of his judgment on all kinds of affairs, and frequently consulted him. He had exercised a considerable but unobtrusive influence in the diocese for many years past. The Wallers are an ancient and highly distinguished Warwickshire family, claiming descent from Alured de Waller, of Newark-on-Trent, who died in 1183; and Davide de Waller was for many years Master of the Rolls under Edward III., while Sir Richard Waller fought at Agincourt, where he captured Charles, Duke of Orleans, the father of Louis XII. Edmund Waller, the poet, was of this family, and his relative, Sir William Waller, commanded the Parliamentary forces in the West of England during the Civil War.

Canon Waller was a grandson of Sir J. Walter Waller, Groom of the Bedchamber to George IV. and William IV. Sir Walter was in attendance at Windsor Castle during the last week of King George's life, and he was in the Royal bedroom when his Majesty died suddenly at three o'clock in the morning. The King's last words were addressed to him.

Mrs. Hartwell James has presented the Rev. D. H. James, curate of the parish, to the rectory of Kilve, in West Somerset, which is of the net value of about £450 a year and the house, and vacant by the death of the Rev. H. Sweet-Escott.

Canon Storr has vacated the rectory of Headbourne Worthy, Hants, which is of the net value of about £320 a year, with house, and in the gift of the Master and Fellows of University College, Oxford. Canon Storr was collated by Bishop Ryle to a residentiary stall in Winchester Cathedral about three years ago, but he continued to hold the living of Headbourne Worthy in order that the restoration of the fine Saxon church might be completed before he left the parish, as he did not wish to leave the work as a burden upon his successor. This church contains a curious sculpture of the Crucifixion, which is much mutilated, and a fine fifteenth-century brass.

The papers have been announcing a "new canon of Southwell" in the person of the Rev. Claud E. L. Corfield, the well-known rector of Heanor, where he has done a great work during the last twenty-five years. Mr. Corfield has well earned preferment, but the canonry which has been given to him by the Bishop of Southwell is a stall without fodder. The prebendal stalls of Southwell Minster were entirely disendowed by the Church Commission about seventy years ago. I believe that they were formerly in the gift of the Archbishop of York.

A number of boys provided with collecting-boxes were swarming about the streets of South London last Saturday soliciting subscriptions for the "National Naval Cadets." A gentleman who takes the same view as myself of the undesirability of thus training children in the art of begging, inquired of a policeman whether the necessary authorisation had been received from the Commissioner of Police for the collection, and was informed that it had. Shortly afterwards the constable re-approached the questioner with a gentleman who produced a card having on it "National Naval Cadets, Lieut.-Commander E. Moffat Soames." On the inquiry being repeated to him, the Lieut.-Commander remarked that it was an impertinent question. Next, as the Lieut.-Commander did not suggest by his appearance that he had anything to do with the Navy, the questioner bluntly asked him whether his title was a naval one. This query the Lieut.-Commander also declined to answer on the same ground.

The name of E. Moffat Soames is familiar to me. A few years ago a gentleman of that name was "hon." secretary to an obscure charity in Wandsworth named the Howard Street Gospel Mission, which appealed widely for funds. Contributions were not always acknowledged in the published accounts, however, and after certain particulars had appeared in TRUTH regarding a cheque which had been sent to the mission, but had not been credited to the mission account, Soames called at this office to explain matters. He was invited to submit his books for my inspection, and I have been waiting ever since for the opportunity of doing so. Perhaps Lieut.-Commander Moffat Soames will persuade Hon. Secretary Moffat Soames to gratify my long-deferred desire, and I hope at the same time he will not think me impertinent for venturing to ask him when and where he himself gained his naval rank.

Lieutenant-Colonel Vivian, 10th Hussars, who is returning home from India, has been selected to succeed Colonel Birkbeck, late King's Dragoon Guards, as Commandant of the Cavalry School at Netheravon, an appointment which is tenable for four years.

I hear from an Indian source that there are many departmental warrant officers serving in India who are only in possession of second-class certificates of education, and who will shortly be promoted to commissioned rank. If this is so it is an infringement of paragraph 286 of the King's Regulations, which makes the possession of a first-class certificate of education a sine quâ non for promotion to warrant rank. My informant asks if this condition is applicable to warrant officers in India, as the Indian Army Regulations make no reference to it. The answer is that the King's Regulations are applicable to the British Army wherever it may be serving, whether at home or abroad, and they cannot be superseded or ignored by the local regulations of the Government of India or any other subordinate government.

As a matter of fact, the first-class certificate of education is necessary before appointment can be made to any of the senior non-commissioned grades which are stepping-stones to the rank of warrant officer. It is true that a commanding officer may with his general's consent sanction the provisional promotion of a valuable man who is not educationally qualified; but this sanction is conditional on the certificate being obtained within a definite period, which, according to the wording of the regulation, "should not usually exceed six months."

Privates of the Highland Light Infantry at Lucknow are aggrieved about the cost of their shaving and hair-cutting. There seems to be some reason for it. The regimental charges are 2d. per month for hair-cutting and 2d. per week for shaving, which works out at 10d. or 1s. per man per month, according to the number of pay days. This is twice or three times the charge in other regiments. A native barber will usually minister to a company of ninety men for £1 a month, whereas in this battalion the company pay £4. The question naturally arises whether the native barber gets all this money, and I suggest that this question should be cleared up.

There are great complaints from married soldiers of the way they are housed at Hong Kong. At the Victoria Barracks, where the Artillery are stationed, there are sixteen married quarters, each quarter having only a single living-room with a partition 6½ ft. high down the centre. Apart from the limited accommodation, the site is bad. The quarters have been constructed out of the upper part of a block of four single men's barrack rooms, each room being divided into four married quarters. Ten yards away is a soldiers' room, the inmates of which amuse themselves by staring into the married quarters with field glasses. On the other side of the married people's block is the canteen, which gives the women and children the benefit of the men's ribald songs on pay nights; while underneath is the mineral water factory with its noisy machinery driven by an oil engine which fills the rooms above with paraffin fumes. As there is no lack of space for building I really think it is time new quarters were constructed for the decent housing of married soldiers at Hong Kong.

Another complaint, which reaches me from the same source, is of the insufficient supply of fuel considering the dampness of the Hong Kong climate. From April to November each married family receives an issue of 40 lbs. of coal a week, and 4 lbs. of wood a month, for all purposes of cooking and drying. These amounts are manifestly inadequate, and commanding officers, knowing they are so, are compelled to give increased issues out of regimental funds at their disposal; but this ought not to be necessary, as fuel and light rates are fixed for each station abroad by the Army Council on the recommendation of the General Officer Commanding, who has only to represent the matter to Sir Herbert Miles to get the issues increased. Too often do generals allow grievances to go unredressed when the remedy lies in their own hands.

A contractor named Joseph John Baptiste was fined £25 last week by the Chatham stipendiary for offering a bribe to an officer of the Royal Engineers. He had contracted to carry out some demolitions at Chatham infantry barracks, and a lieutenant obtained permission for him to sell the old material on the site instead of carting it away. In return he sent the officer a cheque of £5, which was promptly sent back. He pleaded that he thought it only right, as the lieutenant had done him a good turn, to show his appreciation, and that he did not consider it bribery to send him a five pound note. He will know better in future.

A few years ago I used to be always hearing about corrupt practices in the business relations between military foremen of works and civilian tradesmen and contractors. This incident at Chatham makes one wonder whether such occurrences are altogether a thing of the past. Mr. Baptiste evidently thought that to send a little cheque to a Royal Engineer was a thing quite in the ordinary course of business. Had he previously had any dealings with the department out of which this opinion may have arisen? He may have thought that an officer is not more sensitive to a little attention of this kind than one of lower rank.

Vice-Admiral Sir George Nares has vacated the appointment of Acting Conservator of the River Mersey, which he has held for thirteen years, and he is to be succeeded by Vice-Admiral Field.

The King has approved of the appointment of Captain Montague Edward Browning, commanding the battleship Britannia, to be a Naval Aide-de-Camp to his Majesty, in the place of Captain Reginald G. O. Tupper, who has vacated that position on his promotion to flag rank. These and similar appointments are exciting an unusual degree of interest at the present time, as during the Coronation week special duties will be assigned to all officers holding such positions, and they will take part in the ceremonial in Westminster Abbey.

Captain Browning, who is at present commanding the battleship Britannia, lost his left hand by an accident on board the Inflexible in 1889. He rendered distinguished service in the relief of the Peking Legations during the Boxer rebellion, and acted as flag-captain to Admiral Sir Lewis Beaumont during the time he was C.I.C. at Devonport.

I am credibly informed that the latest revise of the Navy Estimates proposed for 1910-11 brings the total amount to be voted next year up to the record figure of forty-four millions, and before the Estimates are finally "laid" it is likely that the amount asked for will not fall far short of forty-five millions. This ought to satisfy even Lord Charles Beresford, but I do not suppose it will.

The little Hermione has become the first inspecting aerial cruiser, and Captain Murray Fraser Sueter commissions her in the capacity of Inspecting Captain of Airships. This may possibly prove rather an epoch-making event in our naval history. One of the youngest captains, the new inspector is a distinguished torpedo officer, is qualified to command a flotilla of submarines, and has gained the honorary certificate of the Royal Naval College. What initials his new post will tag on to his official title does not appear to have been settled as yet.

The armoured cruiser Defence, which has been specially fitted as a "show ship" at Devonport, to act as escort to the Balmoral Castle during the South African trip of H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught, was early last week despatched to Sierra Leone, there to wait the arrival of the Balmoral Castle. The liner is to be escorted on this first thousand leagues of her journey by the Duke of Edinburgh, which will then return from Sierra Leone. Why the Defence should not have performed the duties of escort for the whole voyage passes all comprehension. Whatever may be the reasons for the arrangement that has been adopted, it is quite certain that the saving of money has nothing to do with it.

Some of the newspapers last week made copy out of the gunnery trials of the Neptune. They did a good deal of damage with that useful word "concussion." Buckled plates, twisted stanchions, and shattered glass-work were all made to play their parts. I did not read that any of the gunners were bleeding at the ears. Probably the descriptive writers forgot this. Such accounts of the havoc wrought by back-blast do nobody any harm, and are quite dramatic reading. But the truth is far less interesting. The Neptune came out of her gunnery trials practically as she went into them, the only appreciable effects being that some of the deck planks were slightly started. I think I pointed out the other day that the design of the modern gun reduces concussion to the barest possible point, and that the "kick" of the 50-calibre wire-wound tube is infinitely less than that of the 30-calibre built-up sodawater-bottle gun of thirty years ago.

The Admiralty is giving the Thames Ironworks Company an opportunity to follow the launch of the Thunderer, in December next, by the laying-down of one of the armoured ships of the current programme. For the sake of the big volume of employment which this contract would mean to the East End through the winter it is to be hoped that the Thames tender will be successful. There is no reason why it should not be, though competition is more severe than ever it was amongst the Admiralty contract shipyards. It is true that Blackwall is a long way from the mineral and manufacturing centres; but so are the Royal Dockyards, in which the completed cost of naval construction is lower than in any of the private establishments, although a comparison of the estimates suggests the contrary.

TO SMITH-JONES.

FELICITATIONS.

Oh, wedding belles are in the air,
As "plane" as plane can be;
Bold Robert and Miss Marie fair
On nuptial plans agree.

A well-matched couple troth they are
Who thus themselves engage
In lifelong partnership to star
Henceforth on Hymen's stage.

Expert in histrionic Lohr,
Herself she'll never lose,
But well upon her part will pore,
And mind her "p's" and—cues.

While he has found, a 'planist wise,
Smooth voyaging's true keys;
Though often in the air he rise,
He'll always shun a breeze.

A truce to jesting for the nones.*
Be this my ditty's pith:
The best of luck go with you, "Jones,"
And with you also, "Smith"!

*The poet begs pardon for this Chaucerian spelling of "nonce"; but rhymes, as Byron says, are imperative things.

The Local Government Board for Ireland might do worse than adopt and issue to Irish boards of guardians the circular in dealing with the treatment of children under the Poor-law which Mr. John Burns issued some little time ago to the English Poor-law authorities. In a recent report to the Irish Local Government Board a lady inspector, Miss Fitzgerald Kenny, points out that in Ireland there are over 5,000 healthy children inmates of workhouses in Ireland, pent up behind a dreary wall with a few feet of gravelled yard for playground and surrounded by the degrading company of the world's outcasts and failures. Miss Kenny rightly concludes that it is out of the power of the best officials or the best of teachers to rear clean-minded, healthy children in such surroundings. This is an injustice to Ireland which Irishmen themselves have the power to remove. Perhaps that it why they fail to do so.

A special meeting of the Edmonton Board of Guardians was held last week to discuss charges of maladministration of the workhouse, made by certain members of the Board. The allegations included the issue of short rations to inmates and to certain of the officers, misappropriation of the property of the ratepayers, and the dismissal of officers to make room for protégés of members of the board. Yet the only consideration which the majority of the board gave to the charges was to refuse all inquiry into them. This is hardly the way to lull the suspicions that everything is not as it should be at the workhouse, and if only half the allegations made have any substantial basis on fact the Edmonton workhouse would seem to be ripe for the attention of the Local Government Board.

The investigation of the epidemic of ptomaine poisoning at Wrexham, by which 107 persons were affected, in five cases with fatal results, has resulted in a remarkable solution of the mystery. The whole of the illness was traced to one confectioner's establishment, where a number of pork pies had been made. But neither the confectioner who made the pies nor the butcher who supplied him with the meat was found to blame. The infection of the pies was discovered to be due to the employment in the bakehouse of a person to all appearances perfectly healthy, but who was, in fact, a carrier of disease germs. Quite unconsciously, he had infected the whole batch of pies. This solution opens up an appalling prospect of danger to the community, and it would be useful to know how germ carriers are to be discovered and deprived of their power for evil.

The Kirkintilloch School Board is greatly perturbed at the action of one of the local justices of the peace in letting youthful offenders off with an admonition. One of them characterised his action as disgraceful, and remarked that it would be instructive to know how much of recent increase of youthful offences was due to the magistrate's misplaced leniency. I should have thought the worthy elders who form the school board might have been usefully employed in looking nearer home for the reason for the youthful depravity. If the birch and the cell are needed to keep the youth of Kirkintilloch in order it would seem as if there must be something lacking in the moral training given at the schools.

It is an event unprecedented in legal history that the Courts should reopen after the Long Vacation with four new puisne Judges in addition to a new Law Lord and two new Law Officers of the Crown. The bench of the High Court is strengthened in ability as well as in numbers by the recent additions to it. Probably four appointments have never been made in succession which have met with such general approval, and not the least noteworthy feature about them is that not one of their four lordships has ever sat in the House of Commons. In this respect the Lord Chancellor has established a new tradition for his office, which, we may hope, will outlive him. I seem to remember that Mr. Justice Bankes once contested a constituency, but a single indiscretion ought not to be remembered against any man. Even a judge may be allowed an error of judgment in his youth.

It is no disparagement of Sir William Robson to say that his succession to Lord Collins is more of a loss to politics than a gain to the Law. Lord Collins is a particularly shrewd and capable lawyer, sound of judgment, sparing of words, and always using them wisely. Sir William Robson has won his way in the profession outside rather than inside the Law Courts. But it has so happened that he has gained considerable distinction as Attorney-General in weighty international legal proceedings, and his readiness and address are never likely to fail him in any position. Sir Rufus Isaacs is cut out for an Attorney-General, able to hold his own equally at the Bar and in Parliament, and on the platform, and Mr. Simon's extraordinarily brilliant and successful career marked him unmistakably for the promotion he has gained. It is to be hoped that Walthamstow will ratify the appointment heartily.

TO A BABE-IN-LAW.

"Macte novâ virtute, puer; sic itur ad ——?"
—Virgil.

Congratulations, Simon, lad!
Mere boy, as age the lawyers hold.
Yet though you're young in years, egad!
In legal lore you're old as old;
You carry in your "baby's" head
The Statute Book from A to Z.

Congratulations, Simon, lad!
A Front-Bench member now enrolled.
A favourite lamb, both sides are glad
To see you in the honoured fold.
For once, no cynic wags his nob;
No peevish carper scents a "job."

Then "macte novâ," Simon, lad
(As small Iulus once was told),
"Virtute" nam "sic itur ad—"
But over, here, I'm fairly bowled.
Say, someone who's the classics pat in:
What's "Woolsack" in Virgilian Latin?

Mr. Ernest T. Lloyd, late Resident Magistrate of Londonderry, made his retirement the occasion of a lecture, in which he related some of his experiences and suggested various reforms in the Irish magistracy. He dealt particularly with the maladministration of justice in small outlying villages, where the Great Unpaid are often ignorant, corrupt, and tyrannical, and said he believed that the people would prefer to have a stipendiary adjudicating alone upon their cases. No doubt they would, and it is an absurdity of the system in Ireland that the qualified and independent salaried magistrate is frequently overruled and outvoted on the Bench by prejudiced or possibly interested amateur justices.

For thirty-nine years Mr. W. E. Foster, the Clerk to the Aldershot Town Council, has held the appointment of deputy-coroner for North Hants. Now the coroner, Mr. Spencer Clarke, has intimated to the Aldershot Town Council his intention of revoking the appointment and appointing his own son to the deputyship. The Coun " have decided to contest the appointment, and quite rightly. Mr. Clarke and his son both reside at Whitchurch, forty miles from Aldershot, where inquests are much more frequent than in many parts of the county, and previous experience has supplied ample proof of the inconvenience due to the coroner living so far from the town. Indeed, there seems no possible excuse for the perpetration of such a flagrant job.

Although I suppose that most people nowadays know "how these things get into the papers," a case in the Westminster County Court last week is nevertheless instructive. The defendant was that gallant airman Mr. Grahame-White, who for a time enjoyed a more dazzling blaze of publicity than any of his rivals. It now appears that he employed "an honorary special Press representative" to keep him in the limelight. Seemingly Mr. Grahame-White expected to get the limelight worked for nothing, but, despite the "honorary" prefixed to his title, the operator was promised "suitable remuneration," and the Judge has awarded him £25 for five weeks' services.

---

What on the face of it appears to be a glaring miscarriage of justice has been related in the Star by Mr. Pickersgill, M.P., as an argument for extending the power of appeal to criminal cases tried in courts of summary jurisdiction. The case was that of a lad of nineteen charged before a magistrate with a common assault on a woman in the street late at night. The witnesses called were the woman and a policeman. The hearing lasted four minutes, and the maximum sentence of two months' hard labour was passed. Later in the day the lad's mother, and afterwards his employer, appeared at the court and asked the magistrate to reconsider his decision, but without result. Next the father paid £5, which he had saved, to a solicitor to bring an appeal to Quarter Sessions. The father and sureties attended at the police court, and were informed by the sitting magistrate that unless the conviction were absolutely quashed they would have to pay the costs of both sides. Thereupon the sureties withdrew, and as the father could not put down £50 the lad went back to prison.

According to Mr. Pickersgill, who personally investigated the case, the true facts were that on the night in question the prosecutrix and another woman had "solicited" the defendant and other lads in his company. The woman had caught hold of the lad's coat, and he had pushed her away. Then some men appeared upon the scene, and there was a scrimmage between them and the lads. At this point two policemen arrived and seized the defendant, all the others except the prosecutrix having run away. The woman bore no marks of violence, and obviously the case was not one which could be fully elucidated in four minutes. Mr. Pickersgill accordingly laid the facts before the Home Secretary, only to receive the stereotyped reply that the Secretary of State could find no grounds for interfering with the sentence of the court.

In view of Mr. Winston Churchill's recent attitude in regard to young offenders it seems impossible that the facts of the case can have been brought personally under his notice. There are at least three good reasons for interfering with the sentence. In the first place it was a first offence, the lad was of good character, and the maximum penalty was imposed; in the second, the cursory investigation given to the case by the magistrate was utterly insufficient; and in the third, the manner in which the sureties were deterred from assisting in obtaining an appeal, which the poverty of the lad's father made otherwise impossible, by a magisterial misstatement as to the incidence of the costs of such an appeal, needed explanation. Magistrates are not infallible, and the speed with which offenders are dealt with in metropolitan courts is not a guarantee of correct judgment. Practically speaking, the only appeal which the poor defendant has against a wrongful or hasty magisterial decision is to the Home Office, and unless due attention is paid there to such cases as this, sooner or later the demand for the extension of the right of appeal to courts of summary jurisdiction will become irresistible.

In common with most of my contemporaries, I have received a pamphlet from Mr. Aleister Crowley advertising a performance of the Rites of Eleusis at the place where the Suffragists usually demonstrate. The object would seem to be to demonstrate the how and why of ecstasy, and the charge is £5. The Suffragists really can do it far cheaper, and to judge by the account of a dress rehearsal of the rites, which appeared in the Morning Leader, much more efficiently. Indeed, the mysteries of Eleusis according to Crowley would seem specially calculated to demonstrate the extent of the human capacity for playing the fool. There is no need to pay Crowley £5 for this, though undoubtedly he has shown himself capable of supplying entertainment in this direction when he masqueraded as Lord Boleskin of Foyers, and ran his Society for the Propagation of Religious Truth.

The Henley magistrates had before them last week a man charged with cruelty to a dog and two cats. He buried the animals alive, and when they strove to escape hacked at their heads with a spade. He was fined £3. Compare with this the penalty imposed at Chester upon a man charged with being found in possession of poaching implements. A policeman stopped him and found a net in his possession and ten pegs—nothing else. He was fined £5 and costs I do not suppose that if each of the Chester and Henley magistrates were asked individually which deserved the greater punishment there would be any question as to the answer they would give.

One of the complaints against betting agents to hand this week is from a customer who sent a commission by post. The agent agrees to accept commissions by letter if posted at least one hour before the race. In his weekly account, however, he ignored this particular bet, by which the customer was a winner, and so far he has given no answer to inquiries on the subject. If pressed he will probably deny that the letter ever reached him, and such a denial would, of course, leave the backer without any sort of remedy. Evidence of the delivery of telegrams or of registered letters can be obtained from the Post Office. In the case of unregistered letters no such proof is possible, and people foolishly despatching betting commissions in that way run a double risk. The letter may really be lost in the post, but even if that does not happen it is still always open to an unprincipled bookmaker to declare that he never received it.

In answer to a moneylending circular from H. Dawson, 10, Vigo Street, W., a correspondent wrote a letter expressing surprise at a statement as to his terms. The letter was intended simply "to pull his leg," and it was remarkably successful. Believing that he had found a desirable borrower, Dawson wrote, telegraphed, and wrote again, asking for an appointment; and seeing that these communications were ignored, he next tried a personal call upon my correspondent down in Sussex. The tout's reception was not encouraging, but it was followed up by a letter from H. Burton, Limited, 23, Sackville Street, W., in which they referred to "our representative's call (on behalf of Mr. Dawson)," regretted that nothing definite was arranged, and suggested a further interview. This reveals the interesting fact that H. Dawson, whose circulars are being widely distributed just now, is really a tout for H. Burton, whose real name is Harris Blumberg (Truth Cautionary List, No. 439).

A reference to the list of old members of the Bullingdon Club has conclusively proved the falsity of one of the statements in the moneylending advertisement of "T. Langton, Esq," Dudley House, 169, Piccadilly, W. He describes himself as a "Rugby and Oxford (Merton College and Bullingdon Club) man." No "T. Langton" has been a member of the Bullingdon for the last sixty years, and I have little doubt that the advertiser's claim in regard to Rugby and Merton College is equally baseless. In all probability "T. Langton" is the latest alias of a shady tout named Field, who has previously pretended that he was at Eton and Harrow as well as Oxford and Cambridge.

The following is the letter which I received—as briefly mentioned last week—from Messrs. Ruyter, Van Eijk, Mowbray, and Co., in reference to a paragraph in Truth of September 28. The letter is dated October 3, from "Oost Indische Bank," Donkere Gaard 2, Utrecht, Holland:—

> The principal newspapers in Holland have simultaneously reprinted translation of an article in your paper accusing us of improperly obtaining £100 from a certain person who seems anxious to screen himself under a cloak of anonymity. Considerable sensation and annoyance has been caused here to us and many of our customers and friends by this libellous and defamatory statement. We beg to state:—
> 1. That nobody has ever paid us £100 to teach a lad.
> 2. We never asked anyone to do so.
> 3. This is not an empty shop.
> 4. The whole article teems with deliberate falsehoods and misrepresentations.
> The enclosed article of half a column from yesterday's Amsterdam "Telegraaf," written after a thorough investigation of books and correspondence, should suffice to convince any rational man of the malice and unveracity of your informant, whose identity is known to us.
> Instead of charging £100 to train a lad, we actually pay him to learn a business—for all costs of his board, lodging, washing, etc. (residing with our principal), master's fees for tuition in foreign languages necessary for East Indies work, and £10 per annum as pocket money, are payable by us, and they considerably exceed the £100 that parents pay to us.
> The chief of police here has authorised the local papers to state that no complaint whatever has been made against this business, and personally desired us to call his immediate attention to any further trouble. We must ask you to give as much prominence to the correction as you unfortunately did to the unfounded and calumnious assertions, and, further, to at once write us a satisfactory explanation.

Owing to my defective education I am unable to express an opinion as to the accuracy of the Dutch translation of my paragraph. But I did not say (1) that anybody had paid Ruyter and Company £100 to teach a lad, or (2) that they had ever asked any one to do so. I simply referred to a case in which "part of the premium" of £100 had been paid, and that such a payment was made (the amount being £20) is indisputable. As to (3), the office at Utrecht may not be an empty shop now, but that was a correct description of the premises a few weeks ago. With regard to (4), "the whole article" was a paragraph of about twenty lines, which contained neither any deliberate falsehoods nor any misrepresentations.

In referring to the fact that Ruyter and Co. undertake to receive English lads from fourteen to eighteen years of age for training "to serve in their banking and agency branches in Holland and the British and Dutch East Indies," I observed that the business in Holland seems to be very much in nubibus. The justice of this comment is proved by the extract the firm have sent me from the Amsterdam Telegraaf, which explains that though they intend to open branches in other Dutch towns, they have started by taking premises for a "bank" in Utrecht in preference to Amsterdam or Rotterdam, because that town is more central and rent much lower there. It is further stated that the "bank" is being opened at the beginning of this month. The Telegraaf was informed that the firm is one of seventy years' standing, with agents in all the large towns of the British and Dutch East Indies. I have not myself come across anybody who has ever heard of this old-established East Indian banking and agency business; but if the firm is all that it is represented to be, this scheme for the training of English lads in Holland seems to be none the less extraordinary.

Finding that two of his aged parishioners are proud possessors of Crippen's autograph on circulars of the Aural Remedies Company, a Scotch minister writes to protest against the publication of quack and other objectionable and mischievous advertisements in religious periodicals. These old people got into communication with Crippen through seeing his advertisement in a parish magazine largely circulated in the Church of Scotland. Such periodicals are, of course, much favoured by trick advertisers, because they are chiefly read by a class of people on whom it is easy to prey. The publishers are usually Church societies, and the clergy might do a great deal for the protection of their poor and ignorant parishioners if they would refuse to assist in the circulation of periodicals containing advertisements of this kind.

"THOU HAST THY MUSIC TOO."

(After Swinburne.)

("We hear a great deal of the Spring Poet, but where is the Poet of Autumn?"—Weekly Paper.)

In the days when I nursed a desir
To have my poetical fling,
I would lisp with the help of my lyre
Of the deeds that are done in the spring.
Then I sang of the skies and their glories,
Till I saw I had sung them enough,
So I strummed a few strains to Dolores,
And similar stuff.

How I joyed in my jests and my rhythm!
How I varied the vim of my verse!
And I said I shall make money with 'em,
And the press shall replenish my purse.
With a fire after fame in my bosom,
I invited some papers to bid
For the right to retain 'em and use 'em;
But nobody did.

Then I turned my attention to summer,
And I sang of the wine that is red,
Of the honey that comes from the hummer,
And whatever came into my head.
And I sang of the seas that are sunny;
But although I had gotten the knack
Of the writing of rhymes that are funny,
They always came back.

Yet I cannot construe my rejections
As a hint to my manifold muse
To refrain from those soulful selections
Of songs that I love to let loose.
And if Autumn's in need of a poet
To laugh on the lyre or to sob
(Though I needn't say "if," for I know it),
I'm on for the job.

THE RARE BIRD.

("It is declared that . . . . no candidate or member of Parliament outside the circle of ex-Ministers or special private secretaries ever really meets or sees the leaders of the party."—News Agency.)

"I am so dreadfully worried about something," said the Young Member.

I have a reputation for sympathy, without the power of putting two and two together; that is why I am a chosen confidant. Acting up to my reputation, I asked for his symptoms.

"It began some time ago," he said, tentatively, "and it has got much worse lately. But it is very hard to talk about; you may think me mad."

"Regard me as your father confessor," I said, trying to reassure him.

"Well," he replied, brightening, "if you'll allow me to use the language of theology, it might be easier. It is Doubt. The question that tortures me is, Does he really exist?"

"Does who exist?" I asked, pretending not to understand.

He did not think it necessary to answer my question.

"Of course, it has been troubling a good many of us, and we had staked our hopes on this Edinburgh speech. But now we don't feel we've got any further proof of his existence than we had before."

"But surely," I put in, "you must have seen him often? Isn't seeing believing?"

"I have never seen him, really. I'm rather short-sighted and——"

"And unreasonable. You have, at any rate, heard him speak."

"Oh dear, yes! That started the trouble. It's this way—to my mind, what constitutes a personality is a definite point of view. Do you follow me?"

"Explain yourself," I said.

"Well, when a man looks at, say, an orange, he sees a disc. I suppose a disembodied spirit might see all sides of the orange at once. You may say that is a correcter view, but it won't do for a practical human being. He must be limited to a point of view, and in his limitation lies his strength of action, his personality. You can't hit a nail on the head if your aim is distracted by looking at it from all points of the compass. It produces an effect of vagueness—of unreality—of doubt."

"I'm afraid you've been reading psychology," I said, severely, and he admitted it with a rueful shrug and lapsed into a reverie.

"Look!" I cried, shaking him roughly by the arm and pointing to a familiar figure that passed us at only a few yards distance. "There he is! The man himself! Now, take your courage in both hands. Go up to him and convince yourself. Ask him if he exists."

"I daren't," replied the Young Member.

"Then you are not the man I took you for," I said, in a tone of reproof. "You've no pluck. You don't use your chances."

"It isn't that," he answered, looking sadly after the retreating figure. "I'm afraid to ask, because I've an instinctive certainty he'd say he didn't know!"

SCRUTATOR.

THE CHURCH AND THE "PATRON."

At a meeting held last week in St. Albans, Lord Robert Cecil came out as a Radical Churchman, his head teeming with revolutionary changes. This development of a somewhat clerically-minded High-Tory layman is full of significance for those who can discern the signs of the times. It particularly interests me to discover that on questions of ecclesiastical polity Lord Robert Cecil and I think much alike, though probably neither of us has previously suspected it. The idea which he placed in the forefront of his programme, that every incumbency should be limited to a term of years, has been on many occasions propounded in Truth, and I do not understand how any one can doubt that such an arrangement would have most salutary results both for clergy and laity. The Methodists have discovered by practice the advantage of moving their pastors about at short intervals. Their term—I believe it is three years—may be too short; the five years' term which is the rule in the higher military commands is the least in which a spiritual pastor can get to know his people thoroughly, master local conditions, and make his own personal influence felt with good effect. Nor does it seem desirable to keep men on the move when they have reached the period of life—which I should put at about fifty-five—when their habits and ideas begin to ossify, and they are no longer able and willing to learn and to adapt themselves to new circumstances and strange neighbours. But with these qualifications the principle, sound in almost all professions, is particularly advantageous to the special work of the clergy. Except on the side of the parson who has got a comfortable berth which he is reluctant to surrender, or in the fortunate, if rare, case of the congregation whose vicar has so won their hearts that they cannot bear to part with him, I cannot see any serious objection to the proposed arrangement. A clerical friend, snugly beneficed in Wessex, with whom I happened to discuss Lord Robert Cecil's speech the other day, dwelt strongly on the difficulty of the town vicar adapting himself to a rural parish. Energetic vicars who have been exceptionally successful in populous urban districts are, my friend insisted, notoriously incapable of getting on with country folks, and often fail dismally when moved out of town; conversely, the rural parson is equally at sea when transplanted to a city parish. But this seems to me merely evidence of the narrowing and cramping effects of the present system. Curates move about indifferently between town and country, rich parishes and poor, and one hears no complaint that they are incapable of fitting themselves to altered circumstances. If vicars are less adaptable, it is presumably because long adherence to the same routine of work among the same people and the same social conditions stereotypes their habits and ideas and narrows their sympathies.

At the same time, there are other reforms, desirable also for their own sakes, which would have to accompany this one. In particular it seems inevitable that before incumbents can be moved about freely, the stipends of benefices must be to some extent equalised. A man cannot be shifted from a town living worth £500 a year to a country one worth £100. The country livings where duty is light ought certainly to be more or less reserved for men in their declining years; but to hold out to every parson the possibility of ending his days in the desperate poverty which is the lot of so many of the country clergy at present would make the clerical profession even more unattractive than it is now, which is saying a good deal. The only way of getting over this difficulty is to pool the revenues of the parochial endowments and redistribute them on some rational system. To this measure, as I know by past experience, there is bitter hostility in many quarters. The greatest difficulty in the way—as Lord Robert Cecil will perhaps appreciate better when he has had more experience as a reformer—is that directly you attempt to touch the parochial endowments, you are invading the sacred rights of property as embodied in the lay patron. You will then find that you are a Socialist, a thief, and everything else that is vile and despicable. "A robber of God" is the most popular term of reproach for any one who ventures to attack the abuses incidental to ecclesiastical property. Lord Robert Cecil dared to suggest last week that the laity should have a voice in the appointment of incumbents through parochial Church councils. Did it not occur to him that this implies the disestablishment and disendowment of the lay patron? We live indeed in parlous times when a pillar of Toryism can openly advocate such an abrogation of private rights—and without a hint of compensation for disturbance!

It has always seemed to me that the system of private patronage is the worst of the abuses with which the Church of England is afflicted, and that no reform which leaves this abuse untouched is worth the trouble of carrying it out. The evil is in fact at the root of most others, and the scandals to which it gives rise cry aloud for redress. Only a week or two ago a country clergyman wrote to me strongly on this subject. He took as his text the following advertisement in an agent's list:—

NEXT PRESENTATION FOR SALE.

Yorkshire.—A Vicarage. Net income, about £380 to £390, derived chiefly from Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Comfortable vicarage house, thoroughly restored, containing three sitting-rooms, with ample bedroom accommodation. Church restored. Population, 1,100. Good society. Pleasant and healthy locality, within ten miles of Leeds. Diocese, Ripon. Price, £900, or £1,000 and interest would be allowed at 3 per cent. for five years.

It is only because announcements such as this are to be seen almost every day that they do not provoke an outburst of indignation. That an office of the most sacred character should be offered for sale by a commission agent in this style, its advantages as an investment catalogued in the language of an estate agent or a public-house broker, is a grotesque satire upon the clerical calling and a standing disgrace to the religious community which tolerates such dealings in its offices. In the above instance, though there is nothing exceptional in it, the scandal is aggravated by the reference to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The income derived from the common funds of the Church is used to enhance the price which the private proprietor of the right of presentation expects to obtain for his property; and this is done with the tacit assent of a State authority in a country where simony is an offence against the law. Everybody knows that in the Church of England at the present date the law against simony is constantly evaded by simple subterfuges, and it must necessarily be so as long as private property in the right of presentation to benefices is allowed to exist. It passes the wit of lawyers to draft any law on this subject under existing conditions which the wit of other lawyers cannot get round. There is no end to the abuses to which the system gives rise. The clergyman who called my attention to the above advertisement mentions a case in a Midland county, where a living was recently bought by a layman and presented to a clergyman on condition that he should resign within a specified period to make way for the patron's son—a common enough arrangement—and he goes on to say:—

To speak of only a part of the same county, I can readily think of more than a dozen "good" livings which were bought for the special benefit of the clergy who now hold them, or else have been "farmed"—i.e., the income is divided among the incumbent and one or more members of the patron's family.

There is not much difference between one county, or diocese, and another in this respect. To look for wholesome spiritual food from an institution honeycombed with such abuses and others springing from them is to expect grapes from thorns or figs from thistles. I make a present of that reflection to the Church Congresses, Houses of Convocation, Diocesan Councils, and other caucuses of Churchmen, who waste their breath and time in platitudinous debates on the quickening of the spiritual life of the Church and such-like topics, but religiously avoid all "burning" questions that touch upon the constitution and government of the Church and the administration of its property. There is, however, one of these topics, popular at the moment, which is most intimately connected with the subject to which I have been referring; I mean the current complaint about the decline in numbers and "class" of candidates for Holy Orders. The Church of England will never in these days get for her service a sufficiency of the class of men she requires until she is able to offer them two things: First, the certainty of a living wage for all, and secondly the prospect that reward and advancement will bear some relation to performance and merit. These things she can never offer to her servants so long as parochial endowments stand on their present footing and the right of appointment to offices in the Church remains a form of private property.

"MISDIRECTED MANŒUVRES."

An officer of the General Staff falls foul of my remarks which appeared under the above title in Truth of September 28, and in a lengthy and heated letter asks me "in common fairness to the Army" to withdraw my "scathing and contemptuous" criticism of the conduct of the recent Army manœuvres. Writing from somewhere up in "cloudland" to a journalist whose business it is to cater for a mundane public, my correspondent rules me out as a critic, for he says I am "obviously not possessed of even a rudimentary knowledge of military organisation and tactics," and am consequently disqualified from expressing an opinion in regard to matters which belong to the province of Staff College experts, who are counsellors of perfection, and in whose wisdom a confiding public may place implicit trust. Judging from the temper of the letter, the cap which I made for the General Staff fits better than I expected, and requires no alteration to adapt it for the heads which I intended it to cover.

What are the facts of the case? I said that the manœuvres were a waste of money, since they taught no new lesson which had not already been learnt, while they re-taught many old lessons which the experience of war has proved to be wrong. Worse than this, I pointed out that administratively, strategically, and tactically all that the manœuvres did was to impose on the country, and lead the nation to believe on the false faith of the General Staff's assurances that we had an Army prepared for war at a moment's notice, which is no more the case now than it has ever been. One point which I particularly insisted on was the farce of the so-called mobilisation of the Second Division, which was a sham from beginning to end, because it pretended to be what it was not, and what the General Staff knew that it was not, but what they had the effrontery to boom as an object-lesson in reality. "Administrative realism," we were told, was the "dominant feature of the manœuvres," whereas my observation, based on the reports of experts, led me to the conclusion that everything done during the manœuvres was as unlike war as it could be, and that the whole conduct of the operations culminating with the screaming farce of Chislebury Hill was not only faulty, but positively harmful, since such operations in a present-day campaign could only result in disasters compared with which the disasters of the "Black Week" in December, 1899, were mere bagatelles. The General Staff officer who writes to me now says that the Second Division was not mobilised, and was not intended to be mobilised, but only to be "brought up to war strength" for manœuvring purposes. This being the case, why did the General Staff allow the public to be deceived into the belief that there was to be mobilisation when none was intended? And why did the "general idea" under which the operations took place state that "mobilisation would be completed on September 18" when it was not even begun? If the facts which are stated in manœuvre orders are pretended, not real, facts, where does "realism" come in? In his address to the Manœuvre Staff at the Salisbury Assembly Rooms on September 24 Sir John French apologised for minimising the strategical side of the manœuvres on the ground that they were "administrative manœuvres," and as such were intended to test the administrative ability of commanders and staff in war organisation; but how could the organisation of the Second Division be any test of war efficiency when the division was made up of men and material borrowed either from the Special Reserve, which is intended for another purpose, or from the First Division, which was temporarily demobilised by being plundered of one of its infantry brigades and of all its artillery? My correspondent affirms that provided the Second Division was brought up to war strength, it does not matter from where its men were drawn; but, of course, it does matter very much, the whole value of the test, as a practical war test, depending on men, guns, horses, and stores being placed in the positions for which they are ear-marked when mobilisation is ordered.

A prophet has no honour in his own country, but if the General Staff won't listen to me, perhaps they will to Colonel Gädke, who came fresh from the German manœuvres to witness our own, and who took a far stronger view of what he saw than I did of what I heard and read about what went on. Throughout the reports which he furnished to the Daily Telegraph Colonel Gädke writes with unsparing condemnation both of the faulty organisation and of the mischievous tactics adopted by the English commanders. He alludes, for example, to the cavalry operations of September 21 "as not corresponding in the least with anything that is probable in war," and after describing the results of the cavalry fighting as "negative" and "miserable," he concludes with the observation that "these days of manœuvres were quite unfruitful, perhaps somewhat detrimental." Commenting on the final battle of Salisbury, he remarks as follows:—"It was everything but manœuvres. It certainly was not a picture of war. From a military point of view this battlefield bears some resemblance to that of Saarbrücken; but on that occasion there were none of the unwarlike operations which were displayed on this occasion."

Though I had not seen the colonel's reports when I wrote the article of September 28 I am glad to find my opinion confirmed by so eminent an expert. What Colonel Gädke has said others—notably Colonel Repington—have also said without any wish to be "unfair to the Army," but with a proper sense of what they owe to the newspapers which employ them. Instead of trying to justify mistakes which are indefensible the General Staff would do better to accept the criticism passed on their conduct, and endeavour next year to arrange their manœuvres so as to get the best military instruction out of them, and so give the country better value for the money expended than was the case this year.

THE HUDSON'S BAY AND PACIFIC MYSTERY.

On several occasions during the past twelve months references have been made in the columns of TRUTH to the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Company. These have chiefly been in regard to certain efforts made to dispose of the shares of another company, the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company, Limited, by methods calculated to raise suspicion in the mind of any ordinary business man as to the bona fides of the undertaking. The first of these was the offer to purchasers of shares of billets on the unbuilt railway. In this connection a number of well-known gentlemen were represented as being directors of the undertaking. Upon the publication of their names they without exception repudiated connection with the company. My comments upon this curious proceeding resulted in my receiving a threat from the company's solicitors to proceed against me for libel unless I apologised for my remarks. As there was nothing libellous in them I naturally refused to do so, and I heard nothing more from the solicitors. In the second instance, shares were being offered at a heavy premium through the medium of an outside stockbroker in a circular which made various statements respecting the position of the company, amongst them being one that the railway company was entitled to issue gold bonds which were to be guaranteed as to principal and interest by the Canadian Government. In regard to this statement I communicated with the High Commissioner for Canada, who authorised me to state that it was an absolute fabrication.

The next incident was a communication from the H.B. and P.R. Development Co. informing me that the circular in which this statement, with others, had been made was published without the knowledge and consent of the board, and was absolutely unauthorised. Accordingly I invited the board to tell me, and through me the public, exactly what the present position of the undertaking is. This invitation was given on August 24, and within a few days I received from Mr. Greville, the managing director of the H.B. and P.R. Development Co., an offer to give me complete particulars of the undertaking, and assuring me that afterwards he was confident I should become one of the strongest supporters of the company. I accordingly arranged for a representative to meet Mr. Greville at the company's offices. The interview took place, and the assertions made by Mr. Greville were so definite that I thought it desirable before giving them currency to submit them to the High Commissioner for Canada, which I did in the following letter:—

My Lord,—As you are aware, we have been indebted to you on two or three occasions for information respecting the position of the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Company, and you may also remember that on a recent occasion we published an official disclaimer from Sir Wilfrid Laurier that any issue of bonds by this railway company would be guaranteed by the Canadian Government. Following upon that publication, we received a communication from Mr. Greville, the managing director of the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company, Limited, offering to give us complete particulars of the undertaking. I accordingly arranged for a representative to go into the matter with this gentleman, and the statements that were made seemed to me so important that I think it my duty to bring them directly under your notice. In effect they amount to a contradiction of the statements we have made, and in regard to the bond guarantee appear to supply evidence that the Canadian Government is pledged under certain circumstances to supply this guarantee, and that the essentials for securing the guarantee are being carried out.

Without going into details of the earlier history of the company, I need only say that the Charter is now in the possession, under various agreements, of the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company, Limited. From documents which my representative has seen, it appears that the original Charter holders have been paid out in cash and shares in this undertaking. The copy of the Charter which my representative has seen provides that the capital of the railway company shall be £1,600,000; that when 25 per cent. of this amount (£400,000) is subscribed, and 10 per cent. (£40,000) is paid up, the stock books of the company can be opened. My representative was informed that the necessary £40,000 was on June 1 last paid into the Merchants Bank of Canada at Montreal, and that on May 31 the provisional directors met at the office of Messrs. Brosseau, Brosseau, Tansey and Angers at 160, St. James Street, Montreal, and the stock books were opened. My representative was shown an official report of proceedings in the Canadian Parliament, in which an extension of the Charter received the Royal assent on April 7, 1909. This Act provided for the commencement of the railway construction to take place within a term of two years. My representative was shown correspondence from various officials which makes it clear that such construction has been commenced. He was further shown a letter from Messrs. Smith and Johnston, solicitors, of Ottawa, stating that the route map of the railway had been approved by the Minister of Railways, Mr. G. P. Graham, filed in the department and inscribed by Mr. J. B. Tyrell, Government Surveyor. In view of the statement in the Charter that, upon the due proportion of the capital being subscribed, and the construction of the railway commenced within the period provided by the Act, the bonds will be guaranteed by the Canadian Government, it would on the face of it seem that the enterprise must receive official sanction. This point of view is further borne out by a letter, dated July 28, 1910, from Mr. George Attwood, of the firm of Attwood and Hopper, railway engineers of London, who is now engaged on the survey, of which I have a copy in my possession, and from which the following passage is an extract:—

> Sir W. Laurier has visited Prince Albert with the Hon. G. P. Graham (the Minister of Railways) and others, and I am glad to say that the result is satisfactory as far as your railway is concerned. I was introduced to Sir Wilfrid, and I had a private talk with him on your matters, and from what he told me, and Major Holmes and others, as soon as work is really started on the construction of the railway and some real progress made the Government will guarantee the bonds, and assist us generally. I have also met the Hon. Walter Scott (Premier of the Province of Saskatchewan), and he is with us also. I have had two days of most arduous work, and I have managed to overcome some difficulties which have been raised by our enemies.

It is obvious from these statements that either the position in regard to the recognition of the scheme must have been considerably changed, or that the parties interested in it are engaged in an enterprise the nature of which there is no need at the moment to particularise. I am therefore venturing to lay the facts in some detail before you in the hope that you may see your way to give me some definite information as regards the truth and falsehood of the statements I have mentioned.—I beg to remain, my Lord, faithfully yours,

THE EDITOR OF "TRUTH."

To this communication I have been favoured with the following reply:—

17, Victoria Street, S.W., October 3, 1910.

SIR,—With reference to your letter of the 23rd ulto., in which you set forth the result of certain inquiries made by your representative into the position of the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company, Limited, I am directed to inform you that the High Commissioner has been in further communication, by cable, with the Premier of Canada, who states that as to the payment of £40,000 to the Merchants Bank mentioned in your letter, he has no information; that he understands some construction work is now proceeding from Prince Albert westward; that it is true he and Mr. Graham, the Minister of Railways and Canals of Canada, visited Prince Albert during their recent trip to the West; and that, when there, a statement was made to them that work was proceeding, but that they took no steps to verify it.

Sir Wilfrid repeats that there is no truth in the statement that the bonds of the company will be guaranteed by the Canadian Government.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

W. L. GRIFFITH.

The Editor of TRUTH.

It will be observed that this reply passes over a great many points which I have put to the High Commissioner. It is precise and definite as regards one only—the guaranteeing of the bonds by the Canadian Government. The Canadian Premier categorically denies that his Government will guarantee the company's bonds. I am bound to say that I am utterly unable to understand the situation which is raised by this denial. A charter has authorised the construction of the railway under a Government guarantee of the company's bonds. The charter by itself has, I understand, the effect of a statute. But over and above this the Canadian Parliament has passed an Act recognising and extending the operation of the charter. There is thus a statutory contract between the State and the promoters of the railway, and, according to their own statement, the promoters have taken important steps towards the performance of their contract, having obtained a subscription of £240,000 from various parties, having banked £40,000 in cash at Montreal, surveyed the route, concluded contracts for work and material, and actually commenced the construction. What the result will be in these circumstances if the Canadian Executive refuses to carry out its side of the contract by guaranteeing the bonds, what remedies the company will have, are matters on which I can form no opinion. Assuming the facts to be as I have just stated them, the whole situation is involved in mystery. The one fact which emerges clearly from this mystery is that the financial position of the company, and, consequently, the prospect of the railway ever being completed, is, for the time at least, extremely uncertain.

The consequences of this must necessarily be very serious. Mr. Greville informed my representative that a contract for the construction of the railway had been concluded with an American firm, who had undertaken to accept payment in the company's guaranteed bonds, and that orders had been accepted for material on the same terms. If the Government guarantee is not forthcoming, there seems every probability that these contracts will not be carried out. It also seems open to doubt whether the subscribed capital will ever be paid up when the attitude of the Government is understood by the subscribers. Those who are putting money into the undertaking will do well to reconsider their position without loss of time, and I am glad to have had this opportunity of enlightening them respecting the facts. It seems to me highly probable that a good many people will lose money over this mysterious undertaking, and if they do I think they will have good cause to blame Mr. Greville and his colleagues. Mr. Greville professes to be perfectly satisfied that the Government will give the guarantee, and that Sir Wilfrid Laurier has said as much; but it is perfectly clear from the letter given above that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his Government have no such intention. Presumably if the company had addressed themselves directly to the Canadian Government they would have received the same answer that has been given to me. If they reply that they have never had any reason to doubt that the guarantee would be given, they at any rate have such reason now, and it is obviously their duty to abstain from taking any more money from the public or allowing contractors to spend more money on works and material until the question between themselves and the Government has been definitely settled one way or the other. As to the position of the Canadian Government in the matter I say nothing at the moment, for I simply do not understand it. But it is certainly an extraordinary and incomprehensible thing that a company should be authorised to raise money and incur expenditure by a Government Charter and an Act of Parliament, and that after considerable sums have been obtained from the public under this authority the Government should repudiate the obligation which the Charter and the Act lay upon it. The promoters of the company have not been working in secret. The Government must have known what they were doing. It follows that the attitude of the Government ought to have been declared publicly in Canada before any money was obtained from the public, instead of being left to be extracted piecemeal from the Canadian authorities in London by the Editor of Truth.

THE PERFECT HOSTESS.

A qualified critic has been comparing the Englishwoman with the Frenchwoman. For the former he has a rather sweeping indictment on her appearance in the street, where, according to him, her dress is ill-fitting and pretentious, and she "hangs things about her neck and waist which make her look like a walking sixpenny bazaar."

One may perhaps be allowed to enter a protest against having Englishwomen as a whole compared not only with Frenchwomen, but with Parisiennes, on the strength of the motley population which wanders through the London streets in the beginning of August. Country cousins are not supposed to dress well. So strongly is this impressed on our minds that a country cousin really well gowned, petticoated, shoed, and hatted would arouse in us feelings of wonder bordering on suspicion. It is the country cousin's obvious métier to wear the kind of gowns described above.

But if the Englishwomen to be seen in London early in August cannot compare for neatness and charm of appearance with the Parisienne, who is not only a proverb but a poster in the land for the supernaturally smart hang of her garments, on the other hand the same critic has a eulogy for us as hostesses. According to him, the Frenchwoman is too nervous to be at ease, and has to be constantly reassured by everybody that she is looking charming, and that everything tastes perfect, while "the Englishwoman has a knack of putting everyone at his ease; she says the right thing and does not fuss." This is a great thing, for while to be well dressed in the street is good, to make your guests happy is better, though of course there is no valid reason why the two should not go together.

Undoubtedly the worst hostesses of whom we have any record are Mary and Martha: Mary, who forgot her Guest's bodily needs, and Martha, who overlooked both His and her own spiritual wants. But although neither of them approached the ideal hostess, Mary was distinctly the better of the two, in that she was content to neglect everything with perfect calmness. She had the cardinal virtue; she did not fuss.

We have all sat at the hospitable table of poor dear Martha. It is always loaded with admirable foods. There is more than one can eat, and her hospitality forces one to eat more of that than one wishes. Whenever the servant enters the room any conversation in which the hostess is engaged falls to the ground like a shot bird. Her eyes fix themselves upon the maid and follow her all round the room, while not unfrequently she summons her in a strange tone of voice never heard in any other circumstances on land or sea—the voice which is perfectly audible through the loudest conversation, but conveys by some stealthy and pathetic note in it that every one must pretend they have not heard it, except, of course, the servant. To such a woman entertaining must be sheer torture, and yet, because of her very Martha-ness, which is due to the presence of a strong sense of hospitality, she entertains a good deal. Poor Martha! It is a little tragedy that while she cheerfully sacrifices the whole of her own enjoyment and works like a slave before any entertainment in order to make her guests happy, she only irritates them by her over care, and is constantly liable to the rebuke—that somebody else has chosen the better part.

It is consoling to find that we are not so Martha as

WANTED, A PARTNER in a small but high-class business that has been established for some years.—Apply in first instance to "Patent," 50, Old Bond Street, W.

France, because historians and men of letters, to say nothing of fashion papers and Stanley Weyman novels, have given us to understand that there is absolutely no social duty in which the Frenchwoman does not excel. Pope was describing the perfect hostess—and she was to be an Englishwoman—when he said that she should be "mistress of herself though china fall." It is indeed a test of any woman's training in the arts of true hospitality if she can continue a conversation on Buddhism, or listen with unfaltering attention to the monologue of some elderly gentleman who collects ailments with the care of a connoisseur, when from beyond the door there comes the loud crash, splitting into many little crashes, which proclaims the downfall of a loaded tray of china. One such hostess, who betrayed absolutely no sign of having heard a similar disaster, save by a slight heightening of her colour, was well rewarded when her interlocutor said, "For goodness' sake, go and see what has happened, for if you are not interested you are no woman, but an elf!"

Mme. Récamier is a type of the perfect hostess. She knew how to listen, and she had mastered the art of moving round a room from group to group without appearing restless or breaking up the conversations she wished to stimulate. The male novelist frequently describes his heroine in like circumstances as "flitting about." Anybody has only to watch a bat—the original and official flitter—to see what an appalling hostess it would make. Englishwomen are apt to be restless in these days when we try to live eighteen hours in every twelve. It is gratifying to learn that they can impress a man who, while possessing the right of an Englishman to decry all things English, and also the attitude of a resident abroad surveying things in this country with a certain amount of detachment, still finds that Englishwomen, especially when entertaining the stranger, "are perfection in their own homes."

NOTES FROM PARIS.

ROYALTY AND REVOLUTION.

LAST August I fell in with a Senhor Costa, a relative of the Minister of Justice at Lisbon. I asked him how things stood in Portugal. He replied, "I told you last May, when the Queen Mother was at Biarritz, hoping to turn round King Edward to favour a marriage with a wealthy princess of his family, that he was too well advised to consent to an immediate settlement of the matter. He had already said that the internal affairs of the kingdom ought to be put in order before Dom Manuel attempted to make a desirable match. It seems that he recommended sincere oblivion of past offences and the exercise of close and conscientious economy in the administration. Portugal hardly needed a showy government. Where she had best present a brilliant appearance was in the Bourse quotations of Portuguese bonds.

"The Queen Mother, who had winked at a congé marriage that gave her for a temporary daughter-in-law a lively little actress of a frivolous Boulevard theatre, then went to Lourdes to implore the help of the Madonna. Much good will it do her. This is August 2. By November 2 the Portuguese monarchy will only exist as a souvenir. It will be clean gone. The Liberal Government, now in office, is like the Queen Dowager's smile, which is a product of nerves and muscles, and has no cordial reality behind it. It is directed by the Court Camarilla in the spirit of her father's friends of the Moral Order Government of 1877, and it means to be ferocious, as were the Versailles Conservatives when they had the upper hand."

"I hope you do not mean to bring the remnant of the Royal Family before a revolutionary tribunal and sentence it?" "To expulsion from the kingdom—if we sentence it to anything. But there will be no need. The king has studied in his motor the means of flight. He and the two Dowagers and Dom Affonso have long since determined how to get away once the alarm is given. We are not going to keep them from running abroad." "Can nothing be made of Dom Manuel?" "What's the use of trying? The old coach he drives is no longer serviceable. He's a nice enough lad, a weakling in body and mind with dilettante talents and très, ou trop, soucieux de sa dignité royale—in short, quite the person to harden into an out-and-out Conservative despot directed by some favourite. His father tried to fit him for the navy. Neptune always got the better of him in the form of sea-sickness, and he ill-relished being dealt with by the other cadets on the equality footing. His mother is wealthy. He can lead a charming life with what she can easily afford to give him. He inclines to make a love match, and wanted to do so at the outset of his reign. The object of his affection, a Portuguese young lady, might have rendered the Royal Family sympatico. He then got entangled with the Parisienne. Directly the Queen-Mother returned from Biarritz he set off as if on a motor tour in the north, but really to spend on the sly three or four days in Paris with his charmer. He contrived soon after his first visit to Windsor to get her invited to recite at a fête théâtrale for the relief of the victims of the Oporto fire. The Queen-Dowager allowed her to be presented to her in her box, and thanked her for the generous use she had made of her talents. The damsel and her mother put up in an hotel close to the Palace of the Necessidades. The mother made herself so conspicuous, and took so much in earnest the king's attachment, that a marriage of conscience was feared. A theatrical agent relieved the king's keepers of uneasiness by obtaining a brilliant engagement for the young actress. Dom Manuel and she are believed to exchange romantic letters."

Nobody ought to feel surprised at the revolution in Portugal. Whether it will or will not come to more than the tossing of a fevered patient in his bed it is impossible to say. At any rate, the tossing action is a short-lived palliative which nature prompts. Portugal affords the weakest point of resistance to a general European condition making for the overthrow of effete institutions that are truly as the corpse in the house. Hence the events of the last week. The Queen Mother and Manuel II. stood in the way of a universal drift, and they had to go.

There was nothing dreadful to be said against either, and much to be said to their advantage had they been private persons. Seen, however, in relation to their public character there were serious objections to both. She, through the force of circumstances, played the chief part. Great were the disadvantages under which she lay. She had the disadvantage of the structure of her head, which was exactly in contour that of her double great-grandfather, Louis Philippe, and of her father, the Comte de Paris. With quite different eyes and noses, both men had pear-shaped heads, wide where the cheek meets the jaw, narrow at the brow, strikingly narrow towards the crown, and narrowing upwards almost to a point. They were both men of some capacity of a second or a third rate scope. If they had a sense of reality they were bereft of the power to take high or broad views of any of the questions that agitated the times in which they lived. This being so, they lacked true sagacity. The Citizen King could not rise above small expedients and shrewd judgments. The grandson had cleverness in party management, and though much more honest than Louis Philippe, had a skill that often surprised those whom he took into his confidence in plotting and conspiring. Both were failures. The Revolution had sent the grandfather into an exile that lasted twenty years, and put upon him the pinch of poverty. Neither his sons nor the great-grandchild who is now a refugee in Spain had these educational advantages. The latter had the further disadvantage of being brought up to look on clericalism as a necessary prop of regal authority, to hate the Republic and Republicans, and amid an apparent aristocracy that was but a snobility. As one cannot lay bare the cranium of a princess who has met with a terrible reverse, and is above everything else well meaning, I have operated on the skulls of Louis Philippe and his grandson, from whom she takes the contour of her head.

These disadvantages amounted to dire fatalities in the career of the now exiled Queen Mother. They would have been of no consequence had she lived simply on her fine fortune in a private station. For years she committed herself each time she came to Paris to companionship with the nobles. What Paris said on the subject had echoes in Lisbon, affected badly Portuguese finance, and closed French ports against Portuguese cocoa and port wine. The Orleanist Queen became l'ennemie in the eyes of the brokers of Oporto and of those who exported the cocoa berry to France from Africa. France at last refused to do business of any sort with Portugal. The King used to do the "civil" thing in calling at the Elysée and accepting an invitation to dine there and another to lunch at the Foreign Ministry. This done, he betook himself to the chateaux of the titled Orleanists. He, however, courted eminent savants, authors, and artists, often bestowing decorations. The Queen never made any sign of civility to the official Republicans until after her first visit to the Court of King Edward. Dom Carlos then accepted for her an invitation to dine with M. and Mme. Loubet. She sought to get out of it under the pressure of the Comtesse de Paris, her excuse being a grave illness of her sister, the Duchesse d'Aosta. Two days before the date appointed for the dinner she went to Turin. The King insisted on her coming back by return train, happen what might. This she did, and she came from the Elysée with changed sentiments. There could be no more gracious hostess than she showed herself to M. Loubet in the short time he stayed in Lisbon. He took a great fancy to her second son, now the exiled King. As President of the French Republic he conferred the Grand Cordon of the Legion of Honour on the late Duke of Braganza and the ribbon of Grand Commander on Manuel, then a beautiful youth in a velvet Vandyke suit and lace collar, with long hair in natural curls falling on his shoulders. M. Loubet asked for a cabinet portrait of this captivating boy. He cannot get over the pain he felt on learning of his discomfiture and at the fatality that follows the whole family.

Neither Amélie nor Manuel, when one thinks of their advantages as Rois en éxil, can be pitied for their fall from power. Why should they be miserable at not being able to look down as from a height on their fellow creatures? At private dinners and fêtes they will be given the highest honorific standing. De facto sovereigns will receive them as equals, and a gilded opulence will soon be as balm to the wounds inflicted by the Revolution on their amour propre.

The new Minister of Portugal was dining on a small mutton chop and pulse. He was very fluent, and his enthusiasm had not in the least consumed itself. He refused to admit that the fallen Queen was an angel of charity. Her dispensary was of no more use in opposing the ills now rife in Lisbon than the broom of Dame Partington in keeping out the ocean. However, as she was down, it would be ungenerous to repeat what he had often said against her when she stood beside a reigning King and instructed his Ministers.

In the opening part of these notes I maintained reserve as to the name of Dom Manuel's Dulcinea. There is no longer reason to do so, as it is in many of the papers (Gaby Deslys), and her portrait in the windows in which photos of celebrities and notorieties are displayed. She used to play at the Théâtre des Capucines, when the King of the Belgians often went there and booked each time three seats in the same row in order to have plenty of elbow room. He seemed so taken with Mlle. Deslys' intensely Oriental beauty that Baroness Vaughan grew jealous, and insisted on his spending his evenings elsewhere. There was really no need for her to go to Lisbon under the maternal wing, as she had been some time a player in the small and very amusing theatres, and quite as much emancipated as Mlle. Jeanne Granier when she played at the house of Baron Adolphe de Rothschild with Milly Meyer for the delectation of King Edward. La Deslys reminds me of Mlle. Ludwig when she triumphed at the Français about eleven years ago in her personation of Satan as a tempter in "Griselidis." One might say of Mlle. Ludwig il vaut mieux la voir que de l'avoir, and possibly also of Mlle. Gaby Deslys. The type is voluptuous and flamboyant, and full of the sorcery of the Gitana. There is something raptorial in her profile that is not now without fascination, but might be the contrary twenty or more years hence. The authority of Queen Amélie would have been no match for a person of this type had the opportunity been given her to take root next door to the Necessidades Palace. It appears that she has become the chief lioness on the Ring Drive in Vienna since her connection with Dom Manuel transpired in that capital.

Raw, dark weather continues. Fashion reserves herself for the Saint Martin's summer. At most, the lady setting up for a name for elegance orders one or two gowns for evening wear at some château to which she is invited to join a shooting party. Satins under mousseline de soie upper skirts are in favour. So are the new velvets with a curled nap, the corduroy velvets, the pekins with velvet stripes alternating with silk stripes the colour of the ground that underlies the nap; it may be white, or light blue, or rose or meteor green under a black nap. As velvet of this sort is expensive it cannot quickly become hackneyed. Neat tailor-made dresses, woollen throughout, with curled nap, are very much in. They are shorter than the same style of skirts last season, and barely touch the instep. On the other hand, those who have spoiled feet can rejoice at the persistency of the grand couturiers in retaining for dresses the fetter-skirt disguised and slightly less exaggerated. Thus a skirt that falls in pleats from the waist is hidden from the knee by a flounce of heavy lace, black, brown, green, cream, white, according to the prevailing colour, flatly laid on. Heels are higher, more incurves at back and sides, and narrower where they touch earth.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THIS is not the Age of men; it is the Age of movements, dear Lady Betty. Great men were never so scarce as they are to-day, and great movements never so common.

The circumstance marks the completion of a development. When the nations were governed by a class it required a man to pilot a change; now that the people dominate, movements prevail unaided.

. . . . .

The ordinary Sovereign of to-day is merely a screen from behind which a class exercises "rights" that are contrary to the interests of the Public. To dislodge the culprits it is generally necessary to remove the screen. Throughout the civilised world it is regretted that Dom Manuel has been deposed; it causes equally widespread satisfaction, however, that conditions which prevailed in Portugal have been abolished.

* * * * * *

It has been said that there is nothing original in England but Original Sin. The following letter contains a proposal which is not in accordance with the statement:—

"Aldershot.

"Sir,—Air ships, motor traffic, sport, and accidents of all kinds permanently disable a hundred men a day in the British Isles. It is calculated that in ten years the total will have increased to a thousand a day, which in twenty years would yield a crop of cripples amounting to over seven millions.

"Should war be added to these conditions there might not be a whole-limbed man in the community.

"I propose, therefore, that all international disputes shall be decided on the manœuvring ground instead of on the battlefield. That would obviously be to our advantage, for the British general of to-day almost always distinguishes himself at manœuvres, which he seldom does in actual warfare.

"For instance, were there an outbreak of hostilities between England and Germany a board of impartial umpires would be appointed. On the Emperor despatching fifty thousand men across the Channel the board would decide (a) whether an effective landing had been accomplished, and (b) whether the British resistance had been defeated. Not a bullet need be fired.

"I attribute my failure to secure the championship at pigeon-shooting to being absent on active service for two years in South Africa. As an officer, I write with authority on the subject; it interferes intolerably with sport to have a war."

. . . . .

There are two phrases in the language which appear to be somewhat invidious; they are "A simple soldier" and "A weak woman." Perhaps it is on account of the simplicity of the former that the disposition to marry him prevails so generally amongst the "weak women."

* * * * * *

"It is not death yet; it is only maiming," predicted a Tory peer on the appointment of the Conference to discuss terms of agreement between the Commons and the Lords. Lord Anglesey—the general—was having his portrait painted when ordered to join the forces for the campaign which closed with Waterloo. The picture was complete with the exception of one leg. "You had better finish the leg now," he said to the artist; "I might not bring it back with me." Lord Anglesey lost the very leg at Waterloo. The former prediction promises to be as accurately fulfilled as was the latter. The peers will certainly hobble out of the Conference.

A tradesman wrote to Mordaunt, the actor, the father of the Lady Boothby of the time:—

"Sir,—Your bill having been standing a very long time, I beg to have it settled forthwith.—Yours faithfully, "J. Thwaites."

To this the actor replied:—

"Sir,—When your bill is tired of standing it is welcome to sit down.—Yours faithfully

"T. H. Mordaunt."

It was in little less flippant a style, and with equal disregard of consequences, that the majority in the House of Lords returned the Finance Bill to the representatives of the nation. The Constitution would be rendered powerless so far as the many are concerned were the pretensions of the Peers not reduced.

. . . . .

The system which prevails in England may be described in a sentence:—The Constitution requires us to acknowledge the divine rights of all old-established wrongs.

* * * * * *

"Art is long," the British artist is long-suffering, and the picture-buying public in the country is short-sighted. The public here imagines that the painting of masterpieces was reserved for the Old Masters. The regulation critic endorses the illusion. But our critics are "not born," neither are they made; they are merely appointed. There are as good pictures on the easel as generally came off it.

That, however, is a digression. Mr. Lester Sutcliffe is exhibiting this week at Walker's Gallery, 118, New Bond Street, a collection of "charcoal drawings" which should meet with general approval. To produce them a new method has been employed.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF SOLICITORS.

Sir,—It is satisfactory to learn from the President's address at the annual provincial meeting of the Law Society that "the Council have for some time past considered that admission to the profession should be preceded by some higher general education than they have been able, in practice, to require."

There are two principal advantages to be derived from insisting upon a better basis of general culture as a condition precedent to admission as a solicitor. On every hand complaints are heard of the over-crowded condition of the legal profession. It is said, and it is to be feared that it is said truly, that there is not sufficient legal work to go round. The increase of officialism is likely still further to diminish it. Yet men continue to pour into the profession. A higher standard of educational fitness at the commencement would tend very greatly to check this evil. Again, complaints are made of a certain class of solicitors who are said to foment litigation, to secure it by unprofessional means, and to conduct it in an improper manner. To contend that virtue and culture are necessarily allied is to exhibit a very small knowledge of human nature. But it is a fact that the solicitors against whom these charges are levelled are not the most highly educated members of the profession.

It is to be hoped that, in any improved educational test for solicitors, special attention will be paid to English composition and to English literature. Many men who have taken a degree at an English university cannot write a decent English paragraph. Moreover, a knowledge of Greek and Latin is of little value unless it be sufficiently thorough to enable a person to read in the original, with ease and profit, the great orators and writers of antiquity; while, if he cannot do this, but must perforce forgo the study of Demosthenes, Cicero, Homer, and Virgil, he can find an excellent substitute in John Bright, Edmund Burke, Milton, and Shakespeare. The knowledge of foreign languages required in some examinations is so slight as to be practically useless. In the solicitor's preliminary examination it might almost be dispensed with. But a knowledge of the English language and its capabilities, and of some part of English literature, should be required to be tolerably thorough.—I am, sir, faithfully yours,

A. Kipling Common.

NATIVE EXAMINERS AT BOMBAY.

Dear Mr. Editor,—I can endorse your criticism of your ridiculous correspondent's complaint about native examiners at Bombay. There is (or was four years ago) only one native examiner—the secretary of the examining board; the other natives who appear at the examination are munshis, whose only business is to converse with candidates in the colloquial part of the examination. I do not think that, although they are called munshis, they take private pupils to any extent. I passed four language examinations at Bombay, and I had no acquaintance with any of the munshis outside the examination room. They are, of course, not "babus" at all—a term which is understood to indicate either "Bengalis" or "clerks." Nor used they to be oily, but rather unusually clean Mohammedans of Western India. I gather that your correspondent failed to pass the higher standard; if he had known a little more Hindustani he would probably have found the conversation of these natives to be quite painfully polite. In fact, ignorance is the root of the whole matter; the native man has his faults, but what Sadi calls "the curtains of his pride" prevent your correspondent from seeing the native's virtues.

When I was an acting member of the examining board at Bombay, an officer in a native regiment and a great friend of mine presented himself for the High Proficiency Examination in Hindustani. The native secretary of the board also knew him. I was aware that he had been working like a slave for this examination, but the board unanimously agreed that he was not good enough to pass. He was evidently very much cut up when this decision was announced. Before we separated for lunch the native secretary took me aside and said, "I think that Captain —— is much upset. Perhaps you are staying at the same hotel as he is? Well, I am a Mussulman, but still, if you were to give him a little old brandy with his coffee after lunch it would be a good thing." I don't know what your correspondent would call that, but I reckon that it was politeness by any standard you like to mention.

There's very little swindling of any kind these days at Bombay—I myself never had a Bombay munshi; and it is absurd to suppose that the native secretary of the board would risk losing his fat billet and all future Government employment for the sake of a share in a subaltern's Rs. 100.—Yours truly,

"S."

M. BRIAND AND HIS MOTHER.

Dear Sir,—Will you be so very kind as to spare me a little space to reply to a suggestion of your Paris correspondent? It reads as follows:—"I wonder if the Prime Minister of any other great country except France would have been prompted by his fine sensibility to appear as M. Briand did at his mother's funeral!"

I am sorry that I am not sufficiently acquainted with the "fine sensibilities" of other nations to express an opinion; but as regards England, I can confidently assert that if any Prime Minister has ever been so low, so small and mean, and so utterly regardless of any decent feeling as to refrain from attending his mother's funeral because she had sprung from the people, providing the people of England knew it, he would not remain Prime Minister long, nor would he deserve to.—I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

E. M. Thorpe.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

Cheerful as a Whole—Portuguese Revolution has Little Effect—India's New Loan—Canadas and the Chairman's Promise.

THE record of the stock markets last week was on the whole a cheerful one. A rally in rubber and rubber shares, active reinvestment of dividend money at home and abroad, the settlement of the lock-out in the cotton trade, and the publication of some fine Board of Trade returns for the month of September proved an effective combination of influences to sustain and invigorate markets. A note of hesitation was struck by the news of the revolution in Portugal, but the effect upon stocks was remarkably little. Portuguese Threes fell from 68 to 64½, and a sympathetic movement occurred in Spanish bonds, but Internationals as a body scarcely stirred. Several reasons may be given for the market's phlegm. One lay in the success of the revolutionary movement itself, which was gained with a minimum of fighting. Another might be found in the confidence reposed in the members of the provisional Republican Administration, and a third was the healthy state of the market for foreign bonds. There is practically no floating supply of any leading Foreign Government bond, the market having been swept bare by people who have bought for investment. As regards Portuguese Threes themselves, London is interested only to a very small extent, and even Paris probably does not hold as many as is generally believed, because for some years the Portuguese have been buying back their own scrip.

In the gilt-edged department there has been a good inquiry for India stocks, the cheapness of which I drew attention to a week ago. The recovery has been helped by the terms of the Government's new loan. The amount is only £4,000,000, and none of it constitutes fresh borrowing, while the issue takes the form of 3½ per cent. bonds, to be paid off at par by drawings spread over eight years, thereby avoiding direct competition with India Inscribed stocks. Home Rails have enjoyed a fair rally, and still look a healthy market. Americans, while exceedingly quiet, have been firmly maintained, and the support lent to this department comes from people whose known strength makes the bears unwilling to take liberties. A sharp rise has occurred in Canadian Pacifics, which went well over 200 on the chairman's promise to consider a scheme within the current year that would allow the shareholders to benefit more substantially from land profits. Mexican Rails were dull on the damage to a small portion of the line from floods. The incident, while not apparently of great importance, tends to emphasise the very speculative character of the ordinary stock at current price.

RAILWAYS.

Cotton Lock-Out Ended—Rally in Prices—Some Cheap Stocks.

The fulfilment of hopes that the lock-out in the cotton trade would be speedily ended was signalised by a spurt in Home Rails. It has been obvious for many weeks that the prices could not be allowed to drop indefinitely in face of the strong existing combination of "bull" points. There is not as yet a big public for Home Rails, for the natural prejudice of a decade and more will not be overcome in a week. But now that prices have been put down and dividends put up to an extent that makes stocks reasonably cheap, and now that the outlook—judged by current traffic returns and the knowledge that important economies are being practised and capital expenditure being kept down to a minimum—points unmistakably to a further increase in dividends, there are solid reasons why the speculative investor should return to the Home Railway market. It is not difficult to discover bargains, and at the risk of treading to some extent upon old ground I may point out one or two. In Truth of September 7 I specially recommend Great Northern deferred. The price was then 46, as compared with a present price of 49⅜. The Great Northern pays the dividend on its deferred stock once a year, namely in February. Last time that stock got 1¾ per cent. In the June half of 1910 the company, after putting aside £20,000 to reserve (an innovation for the first half of the year, although £20,000 was also set aside last December), carried forward an increased balance of £56,000, which means that the deferred stock to June 30 had earned 2½ per cent. It requires an addition of £21,000 to net revenue in the current half-year to give York deferred 2¾ per cent., and there are reasons for hoping that not less than this amount will be forthcoming. To date for 13 out of the 26 weeks of the half-year gross traffics show an increase of £35,300, equal to £70,000 for the six months. It may be that earnings will not show an advance of quite £70,000, as traffics will in the last few weeks of the period run against larger takes than they do at the present time. But the company, thanks to its friendly arrangement with the Great Central and Great Eastern, is still making important savings, and a net gain of £21,000 should be forthcoming without difficulty. As the company in the second half of 1909 put £20,000 to reserve, any increase in net revenue this time should be available for the junior stockholders. At 49⅜, allowing for accrued dividend, York deferred would, assuming the dividend be 2¾ per cent., return a purchaser 5⅞ per cent. on his money.

South-Eastern 6 per cent. preferred ordinary stock at 116, with 5 points of dividend to come off in February, shows a yield of over 5¼ per cent. This stock is now certain of its full dividend for the current year, and there is a very good likelihood of the margin over being sufficient to provide a small dividend upon the deferred or "Dover A." Brighton A, another old favourite of mine, has been picked out as leader in the latest advance movement in home rails. In the past three months the Brighton Company published an increase in gross receipts of £19,300. A maintenance of this rate of increase for the final quarter would not be surprising—the current month's receipts run against a decrease of £10,639—and a gross gain for the half-year of £40,000 is therefore not improbable. To pay ½ per cent. on Brighton A takes £25,000, and the advance in net revenue may easily provide this sum. For the year 1909 the stock got 4 per cent., and an extra ¼ per cent. was placed to its credit at June 30. Thus the dividend on Brighton A for the year 1910 is not unlikely to be 4¾ per cent., and the stock at 93 would yield, allowing for accrued dividend, 5⅜ per cent. The Brighton Company is now reaping the reward of its enterprise in electrifying its South London line, and the success attending this experiment has decided it to proceed with the electrification of the line to the Crystal Palace. The work on this portion of the company's system has just begun, and, according to the chairman, the electrical installation will be all ready for the Pageant of Empire at the Crystal Palace in May next.

More South American Railway Results—The B.A.G.S. Report—Capital to be Increased—Central Argentine Dividend—Uruguay Railway Doings.

A further batch of South American railway results has been announced during the week. The Buenos Ayres Great Southern Railway and the Central Uruguay Railway and tributary systems intimate that, like the Buenos Ayres Western Railway, they will pay their dividends in future less income-tax, instead of tax free. The Central Argentine has always been in the habit of paying its dividends less tax, because to have made a present to its ordinary stockholders of the amount due for income-tax would have been an injustice to the deferred stockholders. As expected, the Central Argentine, despite its published traffic decrease for the year ended June 30 of £214,000, has had no difficulty in maintaining dividends of 6 per cent. for the period on the ordinary and deferred stocks. The B.A. Great Southern's report contains several points of great interest. I mentioned a week ago that in order to maintain the dividend at 7 per cent. the company had to forego making any appropriations to reserves, which last year benefited to the extent of £40,000, and to reduce the carry forward by £45,000. An examination of the report, however, will have a reassuring effect. Despite the poor wheat, barley, and oats crops, receipts from which dropped £238,000, the total drop in gross revenue was only £47,600, and it would have been no more than £10,000 but for the fact that as from January 1 the company discontinued the practice of including in gross earnings the freight in respect of the transport of its own materials. Argentina has become so rich of late years that a crop failure has not the paralysing effect upon business that it used to exercise; and so, despite the big drop in receipts from grain, passenger and parcels revenue went up by no less than £125,000, and general goods traffic increased by £92,000. On the expenditure side, too, it is welcome to find that a total of £225,000 has been set aside during the year for special renewals of permanent way, locomotives, rolling stock, etc., or £41,500 more than in the previous twelvemonth. As regards the current year, the company has set itself a task. It is increasing its capital by the issue of £2,000,000 five per cent. preference shares of £10, to be offered to existing shareholders at £11 per share. This will eventually involve an annual charge of £100,000. The conversion of £6,000,000 four per cent. extension shares into ordinary stock, assuming the latter remain on a 7 per cent. basis, requires another £180,000, against which the payment of the dividends less tax will effect a saving of about £60,000. Obviously, then, the company needs a substantial advance in revenue during the current year. Fortunately conditions in Argentina are now good; indeed, right from Cordoba to Bahia Blanca the outlook for the pastoral and agricultural industries is reported to be all that could be desired. Having regard also to the fact that traffics in the coming months will go against poor ones, there is no reason yet to regard the company's immediate task as too heavy, though crop reports and traffics will be watched with closer interest than in the days when large surpluses over dividend needs were assured.

In April and May last I drew attention to the stocks of the Central Uruguay Railway and its allied systems, particularly the Eastern Extension line. The annual reports just published justify my opinion. The Eastern Extension Company shows an increase in net revenue of £24,800, and the final dividend is raised from 4s. 3d. per share to 5s. 9d. per share, so that the dividend for the twelve months is 9s. 6d. per share, or equal to 4¾ per cent., as compared with 7s. 6d. per share, or 3¾ per cent. Thus at current price the shares return nearly 6 per cent., which makes them attractive as a speculative investment. The company's £10 five per cent. preference shares offer a return of 5 per cent., and are an excellent investment for mixing purposes. The Central Uruguay main line did not quite live up to the promise of the first half of the year, but on the whole twelve months steady progress was shown. Gross earnings increased by £20,400, and working expenses showed an advance of only £500, while they would have displayed an actual reduction but for the fact that the company devoted a large sum to the renewal of sleepers and the relaying a portion of the line with heavier rails. For the year the dividend is 5 per cent., as against 4½ per cent. for the previous year. The Northern Extension shows a small decline in net revenue, and its dividend for the year comes out at 3⅝ per cent., as against 3¾ per cent. for the corresponding period. The report speaks hopefully of the outlook for the current year.

RUBBER.

Cheerful Markets—American Imports—Lankat Rubber—The Scottish Trust.

At last there has been a welcome change of sentiment in the rubber market, and readers who followed my notes during the last two weeks will not have been unprepared for the recovery which has taken place both in rubber shares and in the price of the raw commodity. Indeed, indications which recently prevailed were much too obvious to be misunderstood. While pessimistic journalists were unsettling the public mind with destructive criticism and persuading nervous holders to sell at bottom prices the Trusts were making ready to take in derelict stock, and in such circumstances as a general rule the Trusts are right while critics and timid sellers are wrong. In the Lane much the same thing occurred. Depressed quotations in London, affecting a mere fraction of supplies, coincided with syndicate operations in Brazil for the purchase of half the new season's crop; and the market is now said to be in the hands of powerful interests who mean to make money this autumn. Forward sales, too, for 1911 have been reported in increasing number, and private cables from Colombo announce bargains for that year up to 7s. 6d. per lb. American buyers who expected to see "dollar" rubber have been woefully disappointed. There will be no "dollar" rubber this year, and if the forward sales are any guide, next year will not bring it. Indeed, the fall in the raw article was much too steep to be natural; although the situation was partly due to the unexpected weakness which developed in America, and the table which I give below will illustrate the importance of this factor:—

AMERICAN IMPORTS OF RUBBER.

| | Years Ending June 30. | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Imported from:— | 1908. Tons. | 1909. Tons. | 1910. Tons. |
| United Kingdom | 3,040 | 5,726 | 6,945 |
| Germany | 1,260 | 2,010 | 2,914 |
| Other Europe | 3,073 | 3,392 | 4,285 |
| Central American States | 443 | 385 | 636 |
| Mexico | 4,138 | 6,902 | 10,485 |
| Brazil | 14,574 | 19,640 | 17,639 |
| Other South America | 687 | 877 | 1,118 |
| East Indies | 552 | 503 | 1,080 |
| Other countries | 16 | 11 | 7 |
| Totals | 27,783 | 39,446 | 45,109 |

Taking the world's rubber consumption at 70,000 tons it will be seen that for the year ended June 30 last America imported no less than 55 per cent. of the whole world's contribution, and it is not surprising that a trade check in that country should exert a potent effect upon a market which had but a few months previously been strained to the utmost by the scarcity of supplies.

The course of recent events has proved the soundness of my advice to my readers to leave alone for the time being both the heavy brigade and the ultra-speculative issues; and to confine their purchases to shares of the Glen Bervie type, which were not far above bed-rock value even with rubber standing at a much lower figure. The outlook is now once again more promising. We may not be sailing in altogether smooth waters just yet, and readers who bought Anglo-Malay, Linggi, and Malacca at top prices should now take advantage of any further set-back to average their holdings. My view is that later this year we shall see higher prices, and readers might then use the opportunity to reduce their holdings of the big producers and exchange into low-priced shares with a view to capital appreciation next year. One reader asks whether I think Batu Caves will go to 30 from their present quotation of 15. I do not. But in this market there are not a few shares now quoted perhaps at two or three pounds which with some confidence I expect will double in value within twelve months, and the list which I published in these columns on September 28 should not make bad reading in September, 1911. Investors must not expect to make big profits both in capital appreciation and in the 300 and 400 per cent. dividends which rubber is earning, but they should be able to make some substantial profits by one method or the other, according to the type of their holdings. A few months ago we were going ahead too fast, but prices are now at an abnormally low level, and they afford some fine opportunities for profit-making. After the flood of worthless issues careful selection is more than ever necessary, together with the application of sound common-sense rules to rubber investment; and so long as five years' purchase is a fair basis for the purchase of a rubber estate investors should not pay much more than seven years' purchase for their shares. This rule, which is now being generally adopted both at home and in the East, was originally laid down in these columns, and its general adoption will save investors from much unnecessary disappointment.

I do not wish my readers to misunderstand my attitude towards the big producing companies. A two-shilling share, which may be expected to pay, say, 500 per cent. dividends (i.e., 10s. per annum) for seven years, is not overvalued at 70s. The investor's outlay is returned within seven years, and he may at the end of that period write down the shares in his private ledger as having cost him nothing. In practice, of course, dividends do not remain constant, because earnings are governed from year to year by the varying factors of increasing outputs and decreasing prices for rubber, although the one may more than compensate for the other. Let me illustrate the application of the seven years' purchase rule by taking Batu Caves as an example. My estimate of 120,000 lb. for 1910, which I put forward in July, has since been officially increased to 150,000 lb., and similar increases for future years may prove necessary. The company, too, is opening a further area, which will increase its planted acreage to 1,400 acres, and an output (at 500 lb. per acre) of 700,000 lb. may be expected by 1916. The outputs and dividends for the next seven years are estimated below:—

BATU CAVES.

| Year. | Output. Lbs. | Yield per acre from whole acreage. Lbs. | Net profit per lb. | Estimated Dividend. Per Cent. | Dividend per share. £ s. d. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1910 | 150,000 | 107 | 6/- | 168 | 1 13 4 |
| 1911 | 230,000 | 164 | 5/- | 215 | 2 3 0 |
| 1912 | 340,000 | 243 | 4/- | 250 | 2 10 0 |
| 1913 | 450,000 | 321 | 3/- | 250 | 2 10 0 |
| 1914 | 540,000 | 386 | 2/- | 200 | 2 0 0 |
| 1915 | 615,000 | 439 | 2/- | 225 | 2 5 0 |
| 1916 | 700,000 | 500 | 2/- | 260 | 2 12 0 |
| Total return in seven years | | | | | £15 13 4 |

Correspondents sometimes ask me how companies can maintain their present dividends in the face of a falling price for rubber, and this example should dispel their doubts. Several companies are now getting over 800 lb. per acre from the older portions of their estates, and Batu Caves should eventually do the same, but whatever it gets beyond 500 lbs. per acre may be regarded as a set-off against rubber profits falling to say 1s. or 1s. 6d. per lb. profit in later years. The average dividend over seven years on the assumed basis works out at 224 per cent., giving to a purchaser at 16 an average annual return of 14 per cent. It may be of interest to note that at 16 Batu Caves's 1,400 acres have a market valuation of about £300 per acre; and I prefer it, therefore, to an estate which, valued by the market at £600 per acre, yields no higher return to the investor.

Against wild rubber propositions as such I have no prejudice. Ninety per cent. of the world's rubber production is, of course, derived from wild sources, and it is not to be supposed that this enormous supply of rubber is obtained on other than a profit-earning basis. In certain cases I believe the possibilities of wild rubber companies, particularly those exploiting vine rubber, to be very great, and where these possibilities exist and the management is good I endeavour to give my readers an unprejudiced opinion when reviewing the investment lists which they submit to me. While, however, one in three of the Mid-Eastern propositions may be described as promising, I doubt very much whether one in twenty of the wild rubber shares will ever bring much joy to their holders. There are doubtful concerns in both groups, for promoters of the type who were so extraordinarily active in the spring are not famous for that "austere morality and immaculate justice" which the Portuguese are now aiming at. Incompetency among directors, too, must prove another fruitful source of future trouble, and only this week I have been obliged to tell a correspondent that he holds shares in an Eastern plantation company the prospectus of which mis-described as rubber some thousands of nutmeg trees. What can the directors of such a company know about rubber, and how can they be expected to earn dividends for their shareholders?

A company whose prospects are now attracting some market attention is the promising Lankat Rubber Company—an off-shoot of the prosperous tobacco company, the United Lankat Plantations. With a capital of £100,000 Lankat has 2,000 acres of rubber under cultivation, including 20,000 trees about five years old, and the officially estimated yields of rubber are as follows:—

|---|---|
| 1911 | 20,000 lbs. |
| 1912 | 90,000 ,, |
| 1913 | 150,000 ,, |
| 1914 | 220,000 ,, |
| 1915 | 330,000 ,, |
| 1916 | 440,000 ,, |

About 56,000 trees should be tapped in 1911, and the estimate should, in view of the ages of the trees, be much exceeded. A strong point about the estate is the sufficiency of good labour, a feature which usually accompanies sound management.

The Trust companies have suffered rather heavily of late, partly because of the market depreciation of their holdings, and again for the reason that last season's profits were derived largely from a series of promotion successes, such as is not likely to be equalled for some time. One of the soundest of this group is the well-managed Scottish Tea and Rubber Trust. It started operations at the beginning of this year with some splendid holdings:—Batu Caves at 6 (now 16), Seafields at 3¼ (now 6⅛), Tremelbyes at 1¾ (now 5¼), Central Travancores—not to be confused with Ceylon Travancore—at par (now 3), Bandar Sumatra at ⅜ premium (now 15-16 premium), in addition to Pelmadulla and a number of other successful tea and rubber holdings which even at this post-boom period show very substantial appreciation. The company took advantage of the heavy increase in values to dispose of some of its high-priced shares, and with the proceeds it paid off its debenture debt of £50,000, and made fresh investments in low-priced shares from which the directors announce they expect to reap considerable profits. With the wisdom of this policy I am in hearty agreement, and it is this policy which I am endeavouring to persuade my readers to apply to their own rubber holdings. TRUTH alone has advocated this policy; and I know what the Trusts are doing. Hold your £600-per-acre shares and you will receive substantial dividends; but for capital appreciation buy the low-priced shares, and take care to choose the sound ones.

The report issued by the Ceylon Timber and Rubber Syndicate contains an interesting valuation of the company's property by the well-known expert, Mr. M. Kelway Bamber, who, adopting a six years' purchase basis with profits at 5s., 4s., 3s., 3s., 2s., and 2s. per lb., values the estates at £107,000. After allowing for the debenture debt at par, the market valuation of the property, with the 2s. shares standing at 4s., is under £70,000. The company has 1,121 acres of rubber, now valued by the market at under £70 per acre, and my readers may regard this as a good example of a non-speculative share likely to return in dividends within the next six years a sum equal to the whole of the investor's capital outlay.

I hear that the Brich company to which I have frequently called my readers' attention is contemplating some further extensions which should materially improve the value of the company's property. Details will be announced shortly.

MINES.

STILL UNSETTLED—RHODESIAN PROGRESS—RAND RETURNS—EAST RAND DEBENTURE ISSUE—ZINC CORPORATION.

Unsettled conditions have continued to prevail in the Mining Markets. Continental operators have again been a source of weakness, and had there not been "bear" covering by local speculators prices would have gone worse. The public has not been taking anything approaching an active part in the dealings, and excepting a modicum of unostentatious support at times of weakness the "shops" appear to have done little, preferring apparently to await more satisfactory general conditions.

Chartered and Tanganyikas have been receiving a fair amount of attention amongst Continental speculators and the semi-professional operators on this side, and on the whole these favourites have been well maintained. There is a confident belief in some quarters that Chartered will be given a run up to about £2 in the not distant future, and the optimists have been cheered during the past week by the reports published as to Rhodesian progress. The Chartered Company itself announces that the administrative revenue of Southern Rhodesia for the six months just ended shows an increase of £71,000 as compared with the return for the corresponding period of the previous year. Another message tells of increased activity, not only in the mining industry, but also in the building trade and in the development of the company's agricultural resources. With regard to Tanganyikas, a cable reports that the railway reached the Star of Congo mine on the 1st inst. Besides marking an important stage in connection with the opening up of the Tanganyika's copper deposits, this event is of interest to holders of Chartered, as anything likely to improve Rhodesian railway traffics is indirectly a bull point for the Chartered Company.

The Rand gold and labour returns for September make a satisfactory showing. The output is announced as 646,899 ozs., which compares with 649,269 ozs. for August (a longer month), and the daily average production works out at 21,563 ozs. for September as against 20,944 ozs. The native labour return shows a net decrease of 300, but this is due mainly to a wastage in respect of the Premier Diamond mine; the labour force of the gold mines is actually better. At the end of last month the total number of natives on the gold, coal, and diamond mines was 199,644. Twelve months ago there were 165,110 natives and 3,204 Chinese. According to information received from reliable sources, the prospects of a large number of natives coming forward for employment on the Rand in the early future appear promising. It should not be overlooked, however, that with the commencement of milling before very long on several large mines, notably the City Deep and Randfontein Central, and with the expansion of the industry in other directions, the demand for labour is likely to further expand.

One of the most striking features of the Rand gold statistics for September is the return of the East Rand Proprietary. Notwithstanding the shorter working period this company shows a profit nearly £5,000 in excess of that earned in August, the total amount being £108,044, which is, in fact, a monthly record for the East Rand. In my recent article on the affairs of this concern reference was made to the probability of a debenture issue to pay off bank overdrafts and provide additional funds for development. According to information current in the market, this issue will take the form of £1,500,000 debentures carrying 5 per cent. interest and convertible into shares at £5½ for a period of three years.

From the set-back in the market prices of the Zinc Corporation issues last week it would appear that some uneasiness has been caused by the statement in the official circular with regard to a possible further reduction in the grade of tailings treated. There has already been a lowering of grade, but the effect of this has been offset by improvements in plant. A further extension of the plant, with the object of increasing the tonnage for the treatment of a lower grade of material, is now in course of construction. This extension is expected to be in operation early in the new year, but in the meantime, the management says, "it may be found necessary to reduce the grade of tailings treated." Any fall in revenue that may occur from this cause, however, is likely to be only temporary, and it seems to me improbable that there will be any interference with the payment of dividends on the preference shares, especially if zinc maintains its present price. And if, as I anticipate, the preference distributions are maintained, the ordinary shares should begin to rank for dividends from the middle of next year at the latest.

The New Kleinfontein Set-back.

For some time past the New Kleinfontein has been regarded as an "investment" mine; its earnings were about as regular as those of a mining concern could possibly be, and its shares were among the steadiest in the Kaffir market. Recently, however, there has been a persistent decline in the quotation, and the current level is $2\frac{1}{16}$, as compared with the highest of $2\frac{3}{4}$ touched during the current year. At first the selling was thought to be in the nature of forced liquidation, but when it was subsequently found that colonial holders were realising it was promptly assumed that the company's affairs were less satisfactory, and it was not long before a rumour was circulated in the market foreshadowing a reduction in the rate of dividend.

It seems most probable that this rumour will prove correct, as a cable from the company's head office published in last Saturday's papers announces that the monthly profit is to be reduced to approximately £20,500—recently it has been about £25,000—owing to developments being below the average. The average grade of the ore reserves has fallen by half a pennyweight (say 4s.) per ton. When the extra plant is brought into operation and 10,000 additional tons per month are treated profits may recover, but this increase in the milling capacity is not expected to be accomplished until about the middle of next year.

To some extent the rate of future dividends depends upon what arrangements the directors make in connection with the financing of the expenditure on new plant and on the development of the additional claims acquired last year. At the meeting in March the chairman said:—"It is probable provision will be made to finance the expenditure over a period of years in order that it may be recouped out of profits without interference with the dividends, and at the same time evade the expense entailed in having recourse to a debenture issue." The company maintained its dividend at $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for the half-year ended June last, although the 70,000 shares given for the new property then ranked for dividend for the first time; but it seems likely that the next dividend will not be more than 10 per cent. There has been some talk in the market during the past week as to either a debenture or a new share issue, but the official cable contains no mention of any such scheme.

Two Copper Reports—Great Cobar's Troubles—Spassky's First Dividend.

Promise has not yet been followed by performance in the case of the Great Cobar, whose meeting is being held to-day, and so far from being able to reward the shareholders for their patience with a dividend, the directors ask for power to create a further 30,000 shares (of £5 each), the proceeds of which, when issued, are to be applied towards liquidating the debenture debt. At the date of the last balance sheet the company's liabilities exceeded its cash assets by £10,000, notwithstanding the issue of £168,000 debentures at 95 per cent. During the period covered by the report now in the shareholders' possession the plant completely failed to treat commercially the tonnage it was designed for, and the whole of the works, except the power house, have had to be remodelled. The New South Wales coal strike added to the company's troubles in the second half of the last financial year, the smelters having to close down on account of the railways being unable to transport fuel and materials. It is stated that the plant is now running smoothly, and the directors assert that "the company has now entered upon the profit-earning stage, which will result in substantial dividends to the shareholders," but market men do not seem hopeful of much early recovery in the price of the shares (now about $5\frac{1}{4}$), having regard to proposed creation and issue of 30,000 new shares.

Another copper concern whose shareholders have had to exercise not a little patience is the Spassky, which is operating in Siberia. The accounts issued by the company during the past week are for the year ended September 30, 1909, the delay in presenting them being attributed largely to Russian official requirements. These accounts reveal an improvement in the position of the company's affairs, a net credit balance of £9,522 being shown, as compared with a net loss of over £26,000 in the preceding period, and further progress having since been made the directors propose to pay a first interim dividend of 2s. 6d. per share on account of the profits earned during the year 1909-10. Working expenses have been considerably reduced in the last year or two, and the board is advised that in the near future the average cost of production will be maintained at under £30 per ton. On this basis the company should be able to do well even if copper does not go much above the current price of £56 per ton, especially as the Spassky and other Russian copper producers benefit by the existence of a substantial import duty on that metal. It needs big profits, however, to justify the present market valuation of the shares ($3\frac{3}{8}$).

INDUSTRIALS.

Oil Shares and the Rate War—A Drury Lane Success—Pears' Profits.

In the Industrial market oil shares have been disturbed by the open declaration of war made against its rivals by the Standard Oil Company. With the general features of this fight I deal in a separate article, but here it may be interesting to quote some calculations made by Messrs. H. S. Stoneham and Company respecting the position of the Maikop companies. Messrs. Stoneham write:—

> As to the Maikop Field, all those who have gone into this business have done so with the knowledge that they will have to distil off the petrol contents of their oil, which runs about 10 per cent., and sell the balance of the material for fuel. The price which they will realise for this fuel is fundamentally dependent on the price of coal. The wholesale price of petrol at the present time is, roughly, about £9 per ton. In other words, the 10 per cent. of petrol is worth about 18s. per ton of crude oil. Another 10 per cent. probably need to be distilled in order to reduce the oil to a specific gravity, where it can be used for fuel. This 10 per cent. is kerosene, and it may be taken as a product which, if the Standard Oil pushes the thing to the limit, may be thrown away, and, therefore, its value need not be taken into calculation. But if this situation should ever arise, the Standard Oil Company will be losing money heavily, because it will have to meet a price, which will pay the Maikop producers to throw the kerosene into the sea. The remaining 80 per cent. of the oil is the fuel position. This fuel sold on a basis to compete with coal is certainly worth 25s. a ton at Black Sea ports at the present time. In other words the 80 per cent. of fuel would give the Maikop companies 20s. per ton for the fuel, and 18s. for the petrol.
> The cost of rough distillation to get to this position probably would not exceed 2s. per ton. Therefore, the Maikop producers have a safe position of 36s. a ton at Black Sea ports for their crude oil. The cost of bringing this by pipe line from the field to the port will be, at present rates, not over 5s. per ton, leaving, roughly, 31s. per ton as the value of the oil at the wells. The leading engineers estimate the cost of putting oil in tanks at Maikop at not over 7s. 6d. per ton, this leaving a very wide margin of profit. The whole of this position is based on giving away the kerosene and, as said above, when the time arrives that Maikop is prepared to give away kerosene in order to get rid of it the Standard Oil Company may quite well take fright at the outlook.

Amongst miscellaneous companies' reports an excellent showing is made by the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, which evidently put its money on the right horse when staging "The Whip." Gross receipts are up from £16,000 to £51,100, and the net profit is £37,800, as compared with £7,100. The dividend is increased from 10 to 15 per cent., and the appropriations have been on a generous scale. Both the gross and net receipts constitute a record in the history of the company. Pears' Soap, despite the keen competition in the trade, continues to flourish. It is maintaining its dividend at 10 per cent.—a rate that has been paid without a break since 1894—and the carry forward is £24,900, as compared with £13,400. The first report issued since its reorganisation by the San Francisco Breweries is a moderately good one. The profits, while insufficient to pay anything on the ordinary shares, covered the debenture charges and the interest on the new income bonds, after deducting £6,000 for depreciation. Sales went up from 157,700 barrels to 173,700 barrels, and in the first five months of the current year they display a further increase. The Salinas of Mexico, Limited, has presented a dismal account of its doings for the year ended May 31. After allowing for debenture charges, there was a deficit of £520, or practically the same as a year ago. The tonnage of salt sold for domestic purposes increased, but the demand for mining salt continued to decline, and the patent salt furnace, whereby it was hoped to cope with the changing conditions of the salt trade in Mexico, is not at present being worked. The directors speak hopefully about prospects.

THE OIL WAR.

The rate-war which has broken out between the Standard Oil Trust and its European rivals has led to some fluctuations on the Stock Exchange and to much speculation outside. So tortuous is the invariable policy of the Rockefeller group that the world in general is prone to see something darkly Machiavellian in even the simplest line of action on their part. We may, however, dismiss from consideration such fanciful theories as that which appeared in print last week—that the whole thing is a deep conspiracy between the Standard and the "Shell" to freeze out their minor rivals. The ups and downs of "Shell" shares showed what "the House" thought of that theory, and we may equally disregard that other idea that the Standard got up this rate-war in order to pose in the United States as the champion of American commerce against European rivals, and thus to influence American public sentiment in its favour just before the case brought against it by the U.S. Government comes before the Supreme Court.

The plain English of the matter I take to be that the whole oil world has turned upside down in recent years, and the Standard knows it. In the days when it built up its monopoly the only thing that mattered was lamp oil (kerosene, as the Americans call it). While the Pennsylvania crude lasted the Standard could supply the best and cheapest kerosene in the world, and nobody could touch them. Fifteen years ago they had tanks full of naphtha in New York which they could not sell, and all they could do was to run as much of the spirit as possible into the kerosene tank, thereby rendering lamp-oil dangerously inflammable. To-day the position is reversed. In Europe and America kerosene is feeling the competition of penny-in-the-slot gas meters among the poor and of electricity among the rich. It is slowly falling in the rear. But tanks of naphtha (or benzine) do not go a-begging now. The motor-engine has changed all that. Motor-cars, motor-busses, motor-lorries, motor-boats, aeroplanes, all demand an ever-increasing supply of petrol, which is merely our old friend naphtha with a new name. At the same time fuel oil, which is the heavier end of the crude, is also coming to the front, and as soon as its supply can be absolutely relied upon there seems little doubt that all ocean liners, and probably warships of all nations, will be run by oil fuel.

Unfortunately for the Standard its crude petroleum does not produce so high a percentage of benzine and fuel oil as that of its competitors. This is especially the case in comparison with the Sumatra and Borneo crude, which is being worked by the Shell and Royal Dutch combination. The net result is that in the European petrol trade Sir Marcus Samuel's combination has secured 65 per cent. of the business, and only the other day it sold 10,000,000 gallons of its benzine to one of the Standard's American competitors. The Asiatic Petroleum Company, whose stock is held equally by the Shell, the Royal Dutch Petroleum Company, and the Paris Rothschilds (who are also largely interested in Russian oil), acts as the marketing organisation of this combine, and last year it imported into London alone 80,000 tons of motor spirit. At the same time it is setting up a lubricating oil plant, which is likely to cut into the nice little monopoly of lubricants enjoyed in Europe by the Standard's Vacuum oil branches. Then comes paraffin wax, which is in great and increasing demand for candles, waterproofed clothing, and chewing gum. The old Royal Dutch plant in Sumatra is turning out 500 tons of wax a month, and since that company amalgamated with the Shell Company another plant has been installed in Borneo, which is producing 1,000 tons a month.

The Standard thus finds its once profitable trade in kerosene falling off, while it cannot prevent producers of benzine and fuel oil from reaching the consumer. Its elaborate selling organisation in all the cities of Europe, which gave it a practical monopoly of the kerosene trade, is now useless to control the petrol trade. At the same time it is threatened with a flood of crude petroleum from the new Maikop field on the Russian shores of the Black Sea, into which so much English and French capital has been poured this year. Many of these companies will never produce a barrel, but the minority which have struck oil will be able in a very few months' time to market large quantities of petrol and fuel oil. With them, as with the Shell in Sumatra, the profits will be made out of these two products, and they can afford to give away or throw away the kerosene, which is the Standard's main product. The thought of this is the nightmare which haunts the Standard's couch.

Its present policy is an attempt to demoralise the kerosene market so as to retard the development of the Maikop fields, and to alarm the English shareholders who have expected big profits. Simultaneously it has terminated the "selling agreement" which existed between it and the Asiatic Petroleum Company, and is cutting the price of petrol in Europe and of kerosene in the Far East. Possibly it hopes to frighten the shareholders of the Shell Company, and thus force Sir Marcus Samuel to make terms. Its own stockholders never have any voice in these campaigns, which for a fighting organisation is doubtless an advantage.

But this is the Standard Oil's last big bluff. The Maikop companies may be hampered, but they cannot be killed by this rate-war. As for the Shell combine, they can afford while the war lasts to give away their kerosene and make their profit out of benzine, for which there is an almost unlimited demand in Europe, and the fuel oil, which sells largely in the Far East. Only this year the Shell combine spent a million and a-quarter in establishing their own selling agencies, and they have recently made large investments in petroleum fields in Roumania, Sarawak, Egypt, and Java. In addition, the Standard Oil has to meet in India the competition of the Burmah Oil Company (which is protected by a tariff), and in Japan the hostility of the Japanese Government. The days of its monopolist empire are over, and it will soon tire of presenting the bland Oriental with cheap kerosene while its rivals are making money in Europe out of their benzine. To use an Americanism, the Standard is at last going to "get it in the neck."

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

Mr. West's Californian Wild Cat.

Since my reference last week to the Consolidated Oilfields of California I have been favoured with circulars from which it appears that shares in this company —one of the promotions of Mr. V. Carter West—are being unloaded on the public through the medium of the Universal Investment Corporation, "general bankers," Empire House, 175, Piccadilly. This concern appends the word "Limited" to its title in some of the printed papers that it sends out, and as it is not registered as a company the parties running it thereby render themselves liable to penalties which it is the duty of the authorities at Somerset House to recover by means of a prosecution. Hitherto the corporation has been unknown to fame, and it has only recently made its appearance in a small office at 175, Piccadilly. Its statements regarding Consolidated Oilfields exhibit a remarkable degree of audacity. One circular offering the shares at 9s. net says that they "may be saleable at £5 in the near future;" another, sent out as a "follow up," exhorts you to grasp "the golden opportunity of securing in the immediate future at least a profit of 60s. on every share purchased." It will be seen that the two predictions do not quite tally, but, of course, it is unnecessary for the writer of the circulars to show any excessive respect for the intelligence of people who are expected to buy shares on the recommendation of the sellers. How can anybody with one atom of sense imagine that this precious corporation would part with the shares at 9s. if there were the least likelihood of a profit of sixty pence, let alone sixty shillings in the immediate future? The suggestion that the shares are "being actively dealt in" on the Stock Exchange at 9s. 6d. to 10s. 6d. is entirely misleading. The price quoted in a financial paper is a purely nominal one, as any unfortunate holder will discover if he tries to sell, for the only buyers of the shares of this "rank wild cat"—so it has been officially stigmatised in California—are the flats who are caught by such circulars as those of the Universal Investment Corporation.

Yankee Share-pushing.

A choice sample of Yankee solicitude for the financial welfare of his British—and Irish—cousins has just reached me. It is contained in the literature of a concern called the International Asbestos Mills and Power Company, incorporated under the laws of the State of Wyoming, with a capital stock of $5,000,000 in shares of $1, of which $2,000,000 is paid up. A correspondent has been favoured with a type-written circular from Mr. Hugh Higginson, 5, Maxwell Road, Rathgar, Dublin, who is described as the company's special representative and a member of the advisory board, which begins:—

> Dear Sir,—Herewith I send you literature giving full particulars of the above, which is undoubtedly one of the very finest and safest investments in the world at the present time, and I know this, because I am a member of the Advisory Board and a personal friend of those at the head of it. In the first instance it was meant for me alone, and I was permitted to have a very small holding, and not to accept orders from any of my friends, several of whom wrote on their own account, but were refused. Eventually, however, I managed after great persuasion to get permission to accept orders to the extent of 100,000 shares, and after my appointment as a director I was permitted to have a call on a further 500,000 shares. . . .

What a flow of the milk of human kindness. Here is an investment, one of the safest in the world, which, the circular goes on to point out, should return at least 750 per cent. on the present 15 cents price, and Mr. Hugh Higginson, after having had to rebuff his personal friends, is willing to sell to perfect strangers. What has happened to the astute Yankees that they let this startling investment stray out of the country? And why is it found necessary with such a dazzling bargain to have to spend money upon a twenty-four page illustrated pamphlet for the education of people abroad, and even to appoint a "special representative" in Ireland to push the sale of the shares? These things puzzle me so much that I mean to be generous and leave this safe 750 per cent. investment to the other fellow, and I advise the other fellow to do the same.

William Harrold's Option Trick.

I have received the following letter:—

> Before sending any money to William Harrold and Co., Moorgate Chambers, we referred to Truth Cautionary List, 1910, to see if the firm was classed with the Bucket Shop Brigade. Not seeing their name in the list we sent them £2 10s. for what they called "A Very Special Holiday Offer," an option in Great Westerns for thirty days, half the option money to be returned if no profit shown. The option was closed at the thirtieth day without a profit, and now they refuse to return the £1 5s.—half the option money. Do you think they had better be put down for the 1911 edition of Truth's Cautionary List?

This is an example of the carelessness which is sometimes displayed in referring to the Cautionary List. It is true that the name of William Harrold and Company does not figure therein, but under the head of "Bucket Shops," as well as in the preface to the work, it is explained that the list should not be regarded as exhaustive, and that additions are constantly being made to it in Truth. The William Harrold and Company bucket shop, against which I first warned my readers on April 13, is one among some dozens which have sprung up since the publication of the last edition of the List in January; and the inquiry which the List invites readers to make would have saved the writer of the above letter the loss of his £2 10s.

One of the headings of the circular relating to this transaction was: "Half your option money returned if no profit shown." Towards the end of four pages of flapdoodle, however, Harrold and Company made the very different statement that "should the price of Great Westerns not rise during the period of the option above the price at which the option is purchased, we will refund one-half the amount paid." They now refuse to return the £1 5s. on the ground that the price did rise on several occasions. But it never once rose sufficiently to enable the option to be exercised at a profit, and in view of the specific undertaking in the heading to the circular, their retention of the whole amount they received is a piece of unprincipled trickery.

More Blind Pools.

The name of "Allison and Co., Managers," has disappeared from the circulars now being issued by the Anglo-American Investment Trust, 16-18, Daimler House, Shaftesbury Avenue, but it is the same old blind pool game which is being played. You send along your money ("withdrawable at fourteen days' notice") and the Trust employs it in operations whereby you become entitled to "handsome monthly profits payable 27th day of each month." That is the alluring theory; but as I showed a few months ago, things somehow work out differently in practice. It is the Trust which makes the profits.

The National Securities Corporation, 181, Queen Victoria Street, affirms that its most recent "combined stock operation" realised in three days "a net profit to subscribers of £14 5s. on every £5 share." The Corporation has been telling similar stories for years past. I have never yet come across any of the lucky subscribers who are supposed to receive these handsome profits, but I have heard from people who have been welshed by this concern. One man's case was rather amusing. By some horrid mischance the Corporation opened the usual so-called "operation" in an American railway share which unexpectedly shot up like a rocket and obstinately refused to come down, so that it was impossible to say that the cover had run off. On paper the subscriber was entitled to a huge profit, but needless to say he did not get it. The Corporation simply sat tight and refused to close the "operation," one of the beauties of its system being that it can do in this respect just as it pleases. Nine months passed and then, by dint of threats, the subscriber got back his own money, but that was all. To sue for the profits in such cases is futile, because the Corporation does not hesitate to evade its liability by pleading the Gaming Act.

The Equitable Exchange's Latest.

There is a positively fascinating simplicity about the Equitable Exchange's latest appeal to the simple-minded public among whom it finds its "clients." Turning aside for the moment from its usual cover gambles, this bucket-shop is now offering the 10s. shares of the Kasuto Gold Mining Company, Limited, "at the very low bargain price of 13s. per share." The prospectus of this concern was published about three weeks ago, and presumably the result was disappointing—a result showing that the public is occasionally sensible. Really, the proposition is not worth serious consideration or criticism, and the fact that a bucket-shop of the class of the Equitable Exchange has "secured the controlling interest in this mine" speaks for itself. However, the Exchange seems to have the idea that it should present some sort of justification for inviting people to purchase the shares at a premium. It accordingly sends out what is called "a quite independent report on the property" by "unquestionably one of the most eminent experts." This consists of a letter signed "Samuel Hughes, of Freetown, Sierra Leone, West Africa," who, in reply to a request for his opinion, writes that "he has pleasure in recommending the purchase of these shares at £1 15s. per share, or even more"! The Exchange is willing to sell at 13s., and on the strength of this valuation by Samuel Hughes, of Freetown, whoever he may be, some noodles will, I suppose, believe that in buying they are seizing "the chance of a lifetime."

NEW ISSUES.

Subscriptions are invited for 50,000 ordinary shares of £1 each in the Middlesex Theatre of Varieties, Limited, a company formed to acquire, rebuild, and carry on the Middlesex Music Hall and the Mogul Tavern, Drury Lane. When completed, the new theatre will be under the management of Mr. Oswald Stoll, who is the chairman and managing director of the company. The share capital is £50,020, of which £20 is in deferred shares of 1s. each, and there will also be £25,000 six per cent. first mortgage debenture stock to be issued as and when required. It is estimated that the acquisition of the property, rebuilding, and furnishing will absorb £70,000, leaving £5,020 for working capital.

The prospectus is published of the Jicaro Gold Estates, Limited, which has a capital of £75,000, divided into 300,000 shares of 5s. each, of which 109,000 are to be issued to the vendors (being part of the purchase price), and 140,000 are now offered for subscription. The company has been formed to acquire a group of 21½ gold mining claims in the district of Jicaro, Nicaragua. It is stated that the auriferous lodes are of considerable size; they outcrop on the mountains to an elevation of 500 ft. above the river, and can be cheaply worked for some time to come by tunnels. Exclusive of 51,000 shares held in reserve, it is estimated that there will be available for working capital £25,375.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of Truth.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Bergholt.—The company is a sound concern, with fair ultimate prospects, but the bond is necessarily speculative, and for the present it looks high enough.

Juvenis.—I do not regard 50 as an extravagant limit.

Sphinx.—1. It depends on the next crop. The stock for the present looks high enough. 2. A sound investment, but I should not count upon any further substantial rise just now.

Mines.

Argo.—I am not greatly attracted by them at present.

Brats.—Sorry but I cannot devote further space to this wild-cat concern for your benefit. You know my opinion, but, of course, if you think your own judgment likely to be sounder, you can act upon it.

E. A. J.—1. See note in another column. A bear would be rather risky. 2. I am not attracted by them at present. The company has several mining concessions in West Africa.

Fob.—Speculative, but might be held in hope of some recovery later on.

Kelston.—As you suggest, they are highly speculative, and if you see any rise it might be as well to realise.

National.—On the principle that it is inadvisable to put too much money into one section of the market, it would seem as well to buy the West African named. They may not have much early rise, but have lock-up possibilities.

Pierre Louys.—1. A cable was published last month stating that the mill will commence running about October 15. 2. Crushing is expected to commence early next year.

Quiz.—They have recently had a fair rise, and I know of no reason at present for recommending a purchase. Quetta.—1. Price about 5s.; prospects very speculative. 2. Price about 4s. There should be some recovery when the Kaffir market revives. 3. I see no reason to expect much advance.

Springfield.—I cannot say when another dividend will be declared.

Tom Yat.—1-3. Eventually they may all have some recovery, but are, of course, speculative holdings. 4. Prospects do not seem very hopeful. 5. Very much of a gamble. 6. I see no reason to expect much advance.

Veto.—I prefer No. 3, which seem a fair holding for dividends. Vysick.—The remaining life of the mine is short, and in my opinion you could make a better selection for purchase.

West Country.—1. A dividend will most probably be declared in December. Keep your shares. 2. This company is still some way from the dividend stage, but the shares have fair speculative chances. 3. A dividend may be declared by this company in the near future, and the shares seem a fair holding.

Mixed Securities.

Alberta.—1. The company is doing better, but in view of the rise that has already taken place better not buy either now. 2. Hold for a better market.

Corsican.—1. A concern many times criticised in Truth. Its advice cannot be regarded as disinterested. 2. A fair speculative investment. Copper.—1. Already answered. 2. Hold for some recovery. 3-4. Both too speculative to be attractive.

First Loss.—I would not part with the stocks unless a higher interest rate is imperative.

Garden.—The suggested exchange would seem a hopeful speculation.

Mee.—1. A promising lock-up at about 19. Takings, July 1 to September 30, 361,279 dols.; increase, 49,602 dols. 2 and 3. I should prefer 2, which is a very sound institution. Mona.—Central Uruguay Eastern Extension 5 per cent. preference shares would be suitable. I do not recommend the tramway issues.

Nosilla.—Sell 1; hold the other two.

Once Bit.—It has some good men connected with it, and starts out with fair promises, but everything depends on the performances. At present I am not going to take the responsibility of recommending the concern.

Pelb.—See Rubber notes and answers. Paterfamilias.—The bonds are quoted at 101-102. I see no reason for advising a sale.

Quæstor.—1. I have not heard any special reason mentioned, but there may have been some forced selling, as in the case of other mining descriptions. 2. I see no reason to advise a purchase. 3. A promising speculative investment.

Sapper.—At present better keep the money where it is. The price can hardly go much lower, and meanwhile you could not have a safer investment.

Tom Tit.—See reply to "Once Bit."

Veredian.—I prefer the Argentine issue. As to the price you can get for your shares, it is a matter for your broker to arrange. Vicarious.—1. Worth keeping as an investment. 2. Please give full title. There is no company of the title you give, but three having similar titles. 3. Yes.

Rubber.

A. G.—All thoroughly sound. Golconda has paid 25 per cent. (interim) and North Hummock 15 per cent. The Trusts are now likely to improve. Cannot advise as to local Ceylon company. Abacus.—Quoted ⅛ discount. Very speculative. Take an early opportunity of exchanging for the low-priced Malayan issues, which I recommend. Abbotsford.—1 and 2. I do not like this company. The rubber is Rambong. Exchange for Sempah Bukit Mertajam, or Taiping. 3. Worth holding at present price, but the others are better purchases at the moment. Alec.—Hold for recovery this autumn. But for capital appreciation I prefer low-priced shares in more moderately capitalised companies whose estates are being rapidly and soundly developed. See my list of September 28. Ajax.—Hold for improvement. Is establishing a fine business and making good profits. The Crude subsidiaries are being prepared for flotation. Andy.—Average your Malaccas as you suggest. As to the other, see reply to "Alec." Alpha-Beta.—1. As you say, the Madagascar shipments are encouraging, and next year's figures should show a large increase. Cannot estimate dividend. 2. Wait for the meeting. 3. Both good. Merlimau. 4. Yes. A. D.—A satisfactory purchase. No dividend paid yet, but is now earning a profit. Archer.—Hold for recovery, and exchange later. The Malayan companies will give better results. Adam.—Not a first-class company, and after the fall other shares are relatively cheaper. See reply to "Archer." Avenue.—I should prefer Glen Bervie, Sempah, and Taiping for capital appreciation. Astol.—The property is in good hands and well managed. Look for improvement when the machines are at work, and do not be frightened out of your holding

B. B. D. H.—1. Outlook for them all is improving. 2. Malacca. 3. Also Lankat Rubber and Glen Bervie. Badger.—Hold them all for improvement. 1. Good speculative holding. 2. I think so. 3. Certainly. See reply to "Ajax." Cannot fix limit until market improves. Bexhill.—1. See reply to "Alec." 2. Hold your shares, but instead of averaging buy Lankat Rubber and Taiping. Bix.—All good. As to No. 2, see reply to "Alec." Botanical (Beverley).—Tapping commences next year.

Club.—You say that you "want security," but, of course, no Rubber shares would afford the same security as the other investment you mention. If that is what you require, stick to similar bonds. Cleveland.—1. Is the most promising. 2. Frequently criticised in these columns. 3. Watch for an opportunity to sell. Curious.—No. 1 is a promising speculation. No. 2 is a sound holding. C. B. F.—1. The soundest of them all. 2. Has good possibilities. 3. Poor. Carron.—1. Hold for improvement. Is now profit-earning. 2. Quite good. 3. Tapping begins 1912. Hold. 4. Look for substantial improvement this year. Cot.—1. A sound share. Should maintain last year's dividend of 42½ per cent., but the acreage valuation is high. See reply to "Alec." 2. May pay 20 per cent. for year ending next March. Hold for the present. 3. About 6½ without additional property. Candido.—No. 2 is the best. Worth holding. No. 1 is poor, and I should sell both this and No 3 at the first reasonable opportunity. Cotswold.—Should reach your price again. Sound little company, now earning a profit. No developments until market improves. Clericus.—Cannot trace letter. Limits were too high for these dull markets, but hold them all for substantial appreciation. Cliffe Hydro.—1. Unfavourably noticed in these columns on flotation as overvalued at par, but now a reasonable purchase at 7-16 discount. 2. See Rule 2.

Esperanza.—1. See reply to "Alec." 2. Hold until next year, as you suggest, and then exchange. Look for reply next week to "Sphinx." Elastic Band.—Hold both for the present, and see reply to "Alec." Expandist. 1 and 2. Heaviest supplies reach Para October to April. Market throughout the year. 3. Many thanks. See last week's issue. Edinburgh.—Sempah should suit you.

Form IV.—Hold 1 and 3. As to No. 2, see reply to "Alec."

Glasgow.—1. A fair holding. Wait for recovery, and then exchange for a Malayan company. 2. Yes, certainly. Garda.—Perhaps you did not make your application for the new shares within the prescribed time. In that case nothing can now be done. Gurkha.—1 See Rubber Notes. 2. North Hummock and Glen Bervie both good for capital appreciation. Cannot fix limit at present. 3. Rubber Trust's new issue made end of last month. Claim your new shares from your broker. Now quoted ¾ premium.

Honesty.—1. A moderate portion of your capital, but certainly not the whole of it. Never put all your eggs into one basket. 2 and 3. Should reach your price again. When they do so make the exchange suggested. Howrah.—A good list, all worth holding. No. 2 is not first-class, and purchase valuation was too high. Holly.—No 2 is quite sound, but No. 1 is a dangerous "wild cat." H M. N.—1. Pure twaddle. See my articles of July 20 and August 3. 2. Prefer Tempeh at the same price. 3. Sound enough. Exchange the heavier ones later this year. H. D. C.—1. The shares are unquoted, and probably unsaleable. Buy Lankat Rubber instead. 2. See Rule 2. Henry North.—a. There is no ground whatever for the statement. Quality equal to Madagascar. b. Nothing yet decided. c. Hold, certainly. Should see your price again at least when shipments commence early next year. d. Sound little company, now earning profits. Market depression only cause of fall.

Jax.—1. Yes. 2. Yes, but it was too high, and I must revise it when markets improve. John.—1. The suggested exchange would be a promising speculation. 2. Yes. They are very cheap.

Losanna.—1 and 2. Prefer Glen Bervie. 3. Now. Llandyssul.—1 and 2. Both criticised in these columns. Watch for a favourable opportunity to sell. 3. Well worth holding. L. L.—a. A sound investment holding. b. Yes. c. Issued annually in May. Lex.—1. Limit too high, but the share is sound. Hold for substantial improvement. 2. Not an unreasonable figure. See reply to "Alec." 3. One of the soundest. Average now, and exchange later 4. Krian is well situated for big yields, but this and the others suffer from somewhat heavy capitalisation. Hold for recovery. 5. The prospectus of this company was a preposterous document, some nutmeg trees being described as rubber. I should not care to vouch for much improvement. Lausanne.—1 Considerable possibilities. Worth holding for capital appreciation. 2. An early dividend-payer.

M. Leslie.—I agree with your comparison, but the outputs justify my description of the company as a present dividend-earner. Mott.—I hope your Liverpool friend has not sold short, or he will lose his money. Buy the shares you mention. Meddler.—Johore Rubber Lands are quite good, and well worth averaging. Mexico.—1 and 2. Madagascar Prefs. take half the company's profits until they have received 100 per cent., after which they rank in perpetuity as 20 per cent. preference shares, and they share equally with Ordinary in surplus after the latter have had 5 per cent. 3. Yes. £300,000 paid up to cover purchase. Mammon.—You are quite right; the coming producers stand a much better chance of capital appreciation. But the big producers are not over valued on a seven years' purchase basis, and some old rubber is yielding a profit of £240 per acre this year.

Nestor.—a. All sound on seven years' purchase scale. b. See reply to "Alec." I have a good opinion of 4, 5, 10, 11, 12, and 15 as purchases with a view to steady capital appreciation. c. Lumut 10. Johore Rubber Lands may sell part, but say 15. d. Inch Kenneth dividend 100 per cent. for 1909-10. Estimate 210 per cent. for 1910-11. e. Kajang prospectus error was unfortunate, but purchase price was reasonable, and I confirm my good opinion. Nix.—Yes. A promising speculation. North Tipperary.—A speculative proposition which I do not care to recommend. Notlog.—1. Worth holding. 2 and 3. Sell both at first reasonable opportunity and reinvest in a sound company, as you suggest.

Out.—1. Bukit Mertajam tapping commences 1911. 2. Merlimau 1912. 3. Kajang 1911.

Primavera.—Wait until markets improve. Paisley.—1. Average. 2. Hold. 3. I think so. Await further news. Pecus.—You might hold for 5s. Pieper.—Average a. At present prices I prefer Taiping to the other. Progress.—1 and 2. Yes; average. 3. A good purchase.

Queen (Dover).—1 and 2. Sell when you can do so, even at a slight loss and buy No. 3, which is quite sound. Queen (H.M.S.).—1. Average now. Tapping recommences in October. 2. Yes. Now tapping.

Rex.—All good. Hold for steady improvement. Roddy.—Worth holding, but if you see a reasonable profit you might take it. Radium.—1 Yes. 2. Not just yet. 3 and 4. Poor. 5. Good speculative holding. 6. If they show you a profit. R. D. Y. C.—One objection to the rubber shares offered by the Sterling Debenture Corporation is that they are never likely to be marketable here. Their circularising methods are, moreover, sufficient to condemn these Yankee share pushers.

Shylock.—1, 2, and 3. See reply to "Alec." 4 and 5. Worth holding. 6. Frequently criticised in these columns. Slainte.—1. He does not understand rubber. See Rubber Notes. 2. Quite good. Taps next year. 3. Quite good. Now tapping. Septem.—1. Hold. 2. Quite successful. 3. Not yet announced.

T. H. C. W.—1. Yes. 2. Yes. Thauma.—1. See reply to "Alec." 2 and 3. Well worth holding. 4. Hold. The Prefs. are well secured.

Unfortunate.—Nos. 3 and 5 are well worth averaging. Buy Strathmore.

W. H. M.—Yield per tree is small, but yield per acre is large. Company expects ¾ lb. per tree from a few tappings, and yields of 2 lbs. not uncommon. Woollen.—1. Await further news. 2. Sell at a reasonable opportunity. 3. Worth holding. Wants.—Yes. Glen Bervie. Washed.—Limit was too high, but prospects good. Wait for the demonstration and then write again. Wood.—1. Worth averaging. 2. Should earn a dividend next year. Watchful.—1. This year. 2. Should develop rapidly next year.

X. Y. Z.—1. A sound share. Worth holding. 2. Sound little company. Not over-valued. 3. Purchase valuation was too high. Worth present price.

Zeus.—1. Cannot fix limit at present. 2 and 3. I cannot recommend either. Zenodorus.—1. Quite good for steady appreciation. First dividend was paid from catch crops. 2. An excellent purchase. 3. Great possibilities. No reason to apprehend trouble. Zut.—1. Chersonese prospectus estimates:—1910, 15,000 lbs.; 1911, 60,000; 1912, 220,000; 1913, 325,000; 1914, 450,000. Very moderate, and should be well exceeded. 2. High opinion. Average. Zist I.—A long waiting proposition. Not bad. Worth holding at present discount.

Miscellaneous.

Arton.—The United Stock and Share Corporation is a common bucket-shop flat-trap.

Betty.—You have been well advised, and it would be difficult to beat the broker's two selections. Blanchette.—Thanks; see note in another column.

Coley.—No. 1 is sound, and worth holding. I am afraid the prospects for 2 are poor. 3. All depends on the kind of property and its situation, matters upon which your own knowledge should be the best guide. But if you mean to ask whether freehold house property should be sold because of the land taxes, I have no hesitation in replying in the negative. Cleveland.—There is a good deal of speculation about Nos. 1 and 2, especially the latter, though I know of no special reason for selling now No. 3 is a good investment. Carabinier.—Let the amount accumulate to £100 in the Savings Bank, then write me again Colonial.—1. Have nothing to do with the so-called bank. 2. Impossible to get such a yield without great risk. You could get 5 per cent. with very fair security upon Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per cent. debenture stock. Cobbler.—1. Sound enough. 2. Competition likely to grow keener as the years go on. Should prefer Lever Bros. 5 per cent. A preference. Compound Interest.—I do not recommend a, and b is a so-called bank of which I have a most unfavourable opinion. Several first-class insurance companies issue policies for the special purpose of making provision for children's education, and you will get a much better and surer result in that way. If you care to repeat your inquiry with particulars as to the sum available, etc., further advice can be given in our "Insurance" column.

Delphos.—They are on the whole a speculative lot, and if you must sell I see no particular reason why you should delay doing so.

E. L. S.—I have not heard of this swindling bucket-shop lately. Probably the same parties are now working under a new alias. E. J. M.—No; I am afraid it is impossible to avoid the attentions of such circularising pests as Duncan Forbes and Co.

Forest.—Nos. 1 and 3 look the pick as speculative purchases. With regard to 1, a policy has been taken out with the Commercial Union Assurance Company to provide for repayment in 1939, but the premiums on the policy have to be paid annually out of earnings. Fiduciary, South Africa.—1. A Yankee share-pushing concern; shun it and all other American—or, for that matter, British—circularisers of that kind. 2. Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 31, Threadneedle Street, London, E.C. F. M.—Thanks.

Fiesole.—The shares are an excellent investment and are worth keeping.

H. M C.—1. It seems hardly worth while selling at the present figure. 2 I believe the privilege does not extend to the debenture holders.

Irish.—1. Yes. 2. They were at a rather high price previously. 3. No. 4. The shares look fairly valued. 5. No; there are more attractive purchases. Insular.—1. I know nothing particular against the firm, but my general advice is that the public is best advised to deal direct with a member of the Stock Exchange. 2-4. I would get rid of them all. Insucar.—1. No reason to doubt their integrity, but dealings in stocks and shares should be carried out through a member of the Stock Exchange. 2. I have no information about it. 3. Hold for a recovery. 4. Extremely speculative.

J. N.—I do not recommend the shares.

Kilkenny.—1. I do not advise a purchase. 2. The shares have already had a good rise, and I would not buy now. 3. The previous answer applies. Kith.—1. Sell. 2. No information beyond the prospectus. 3. It came out under good auspices, but the shares are necessarily a hazardous holding.

Lancashire.—It is obviously a dodge to fool the creditors. You should sue the firm.

Navy.—1. No price obtainable. 2. Investigation doubtless desirable, but I do not recommend you to send money to the people who are inviting subscriptions. Novar.—Keep 3. I do not see much attraction in 2, and would be inclined to sell. Better not buy No. 1 at the present price.

O. H.—I would not go so far as to call them safe, but at present prices it would probably be a mistake to sell. Oilman.—I would not buy the shares just now. The property is situated in Peru.

Pyrmont.—Old members of the London Stock Exchange, which is, for your purpose, I should think, a sufficient assurance.

Timber.—1 and 2. Both sound concerns, but prices now discount a good deal 3 Yes, hold them.

Veltex.—No accounts have been published for some time. I am afraid the scrip is practically worthless.

W. (Barnes).—Certainly not. I am constantly hearing from people who are unable to obtain payments due to them. The firm has often been exposed in Truth, and I shall be glad to learn how you came to contemplate doing business with them. It has been understood that they have practically ceased to do business.

VIGILANT.

Solicitors on Surrender Values—New Companies—Highly Paid Incompetent Managers—Paying Unearned Dividends—Deterrent Legislation—Foolish Directors and Shareholders.

MY recent articles on the surrender values of limited payment life policies have brought me a letter from a firm of solicitors who quote the case of a client of theirs. He took a policy, subject to the payment of premiums for only fifteen years, and then application was made for the surrender value, which my correspondents regard as being inadequate in amount, and not bearing out my remarks. My correspondents do not supply me with sufficient information to deal with the matter in detail, but it is obvious that they have ignored the bonus altogether. When a man takes a participating policy it is manifestly inappropriate to ignore the whole question of profits, for participation in which a considerably increased rate of premium has been paid. I wonder whether it would be in any way impolite to suggest to my esteemed correspondents that their letter supports the remark which I made last week, that solicitors are not, as a rule, qualified to give advice upon the subject of life assurance?

The longer I live and the more I see of the working of insurance offices, the more convinced I become of the folly, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, of starting new insurance offices. I am not prepared to say that it is financially foolish of the men who become managers of these new concerns to start them; for them the process is, for a time, a lucrative one. Being for the most part unable to obtain a position of any importance in a good company, they proceed to form a company on their own account; they get together a number of people as directors and shareholders who have money but are lacking in brains, or, at any rate, in that amount of knowledge necessary for forming a sane judgment about insurance affairs. The manager that is to be makes his own terms, which frequently include a commission on the business in addition to a salary. Partly through ignorance of the nature of insurance risks, and sometimes, at least, with a view to increasing the amount of his own commission, he builds up a large business which is bound to be of an unprofitable nature. The directors, poor puppets, do not understand what is being done, and then, perhaps, there comes a time when they have to decide whether or not a dividend shall be declared. It is very easy, by manipulation of accounts, either ignorantly or fraudulently, to declare a dividend that has not been earned. It is most simple to understate the liabilities either for outstanding claims or for unexpired risks, or both; thus, in fact, a dividend is paid out of capital which the directors may or may not be personally responsible for refunding. Quite possibly, on the strength of having paid substantial dividends which have not been earned, a successful appeal will be made for more capital, and the shares will be issued at a substantial premium. Within a few years the true position becomes manifest, whereupon the directors blame their misfortune, or their bad luck, or something or somebody other than their own ignorance of the business and their own foolishness and incompetence. The shareholders grumble, but are more or less helpless, and in one way or another the company comes to an end, everybody, except, perhaps, the manager who started it, losing their money by the process.

Experiences of this kind are by no means exceptional, and it might be thought that they would deter other people from taking the same foolish course; but not a bit of it. Experience may teach the actual sufferers, but the experience of others seems to have no effect upon the next batch of directors and shareholders who have money which they want to keep, but which they are reasonably sure to lose. In this way, in years gone by, mushroom after mushroom has been started; there has been exhibited an imposing appearance of growth, which shrivels away to nothingness in the course of a very short time. These remarks apply principally to companies doing fire and workmen's compensation business, but to a considerable extent they apply also to industrial life offices. The failure is slower and more insidious in connection with industrial life offices than it is with fire or employers' liability business. The claims under life policies do not arise in any considerable volume until the business has been going on for a good many years. In the meantime it is very likely that the whole of the capital has been spent in establishing the business. This building up of a good-will may prove a valuable asset in the case of the ultimate success of the company, as was seen recently when the London, Edinburgh, and Glasgow sold its business to the Pearl. Such results as this latter are, however, rare, and the business of this particular company had for years been conducted with great ability under adverse circumstances. It is entirely foolish to suppose that the exceptional experience of this office is likely to be repeated in many other cases. The Life Assurance Companies Act of 1870 made it necessary to deposit a sum of £20,000 before life business could be commenced. Consequently most of the new companies took power to transact all forms of insurance except life assurance. Then came the Employers' Liability Insurance Companies Act, which required a deposit of £20,000 for companies doing this class of business. Thereafter the new mushrooms proposed to undertake all forms of insurance except life and employers' liability. Later there was the Assurance Companies Act, which came into force on July 1 last; this requires large deposits to be made before a company can commence, practically, any form of assurance. This, it may be hoped, will accomplish its purpose and prevent the formation of many new companies, since there are only quite exceptional circumstances in which there is any likelihood of success.

I suppose it is a tribute to the universally recognised excellence of the good insurance offices that men with money, and with good reputations of one kind or another, are content and even anxious to become directors of an "insurance company." It is a quite nice thing to be an insurance director of a company of the right sort, but it is quite otherwise than a nice thing to make oneself responsible for the direction of a company founded on wrong lines, managed by an incompetent person, possessed of inadequate resources, and compelled to cut rates to the losing point in order to obtain business, besides being faced with the necessity of a higher rate of expenditure than good offices with strong connections incur.

I cannot expect to reach and to influence everybody. Much good will result from the Assurance Companies Act; but even this will be powerless without the creation of a fairly strong public opinion upon the subject. I therefore hope that a little plain speaking may at least induce a good many people to refuse to become either directors of, or shareholders, or policyholders in, new concerns of the mushroom order, which are a nuisance and a source of loss not merely to the people directly connected with it, but also to sound insurance companies.

Answers to Correspondents.

[Inquiries on the subject of insurance are answered in this column every week. Every letter containing an inquiry must be accompanied by a coupon cut from the third page of the coloured cover of Truth.]

Nemo.—I should advise a deferred assurance policy for your child in the United Kingdom Temperance Institution in preference to either of the other policies which you mention. Banner.—Scottish Life or English and Scottish Law. Eblana (Dublin).—The company is a new one, of which I have no very high opinion, but the probability is that you had better transfer your policy. I suppose this is the object of your inquiry. M. C.—The Equitable Society, U.S.A., is entirely sound in every way. You can be quite confident about your policy. R. J. B.—The surrender value that is mentioned in the letter which you quote is of an extremely satisfactory character, and you have every reason to be well satisfied with it. Scrutator.—The house-purchase certificates were of an extremely unsatisfactory character, and your best plan is to change to a life policy in the same office. It is very likely that you will not be able to obtain a loan in connection with house purchase if you happen to want it. Ambala.—The company is entirely safe and reliable, and both your policies are good. Worried.—Both the societies you mention are excellent. The Yorkshire is likely to be the better of the two, though I cannot say for certain without knowing your age. For this particular class of policy the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York is the best office.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

SUMATRA PARA RUBBER PLANTATIONS, LIMITED.

A Satisfactory Record and the Outlook.

The third annual ordinary general meeting of the Sumatra Para Rubber Plantations, Limited, was held on the 10th inst. at the London Chamber of Commerce, Oxford Court, Cannon Street, E.C., Mr. Keith Fraser Arbuthnot (chairman of the company) presiding.

The Secretary (Mr. P. E. Hervey) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman said: Gentlemen,—This is the third occasion on which I have had the pleasure of meeting you. On the first occasion our year's working showed a crop of 52,250 lbs., and we paid a dividend of 10 per cent.; last year our crop was 73,724 lbs., and we paid 15 per cent. away in dividends; whilst for the year which ended on June 30 last our crop of rubber turned out 122,248 lbs., from which we have made a trading profit of £33,992 14s. 3d. Out of this we have already paid an interim dividend of 12½ per cent., and your directors now recommend a further payment of 5d. on every 2s. share, making 33⅓ per cent. for the year, a record which must be satisfactory to us all. (Applause.) The crop increase has been excellent, and has been procured from about 370 acres, which is all that has been tapped as yet out of our total planted area of 2,400 acres; but I think the most remarkable point is the way our manager has this year been able to reduce the cost of production. Our estimate for the present year is 200,000 lbs. dry rubber, which we hope to obtain from 450 acres which we shall be tapping during the year, and our cost of collecting and curing our manager estimates at 15 guilder cents, or, say, 3½d. per lb. The past year has, of course, been an interesting one to all those engaged in rubber cultivation, and we have witnessed a boom in rubber shares which we are told has eclipsed anything in history. But, gentlemen, leaving out the effects of the boom in the raw article, an appreciation in the price of the shares in good rubber companies was, in my opinion, inevitable, for they were sound at bottom and sound all through, founded by men who took the risk of planting, and floated, as a rule, without intermediate profit, and I do not consider that there has been a boom, if the word means unwarranted inflation, but only a natural and gradual appreciation in values which may possibly have brought in its train the flotation of some companies not quite of the same order of merit as her own. The rise in share quotations, although natural to a large extent has, of course, been influenced and must always continue to be governed, by the price of the commodity which we produce, and we have had during the year a market quite unprecedented. This time last year fine plantation kinds were quoted at 9s. 6d. a lb.; the price gradually rose, with, of course, minor fluctuations, until April, when it touched 12s. 6d., since when it has gradually declined to the present price of 6s. a lb. Of course, it would have been nice if the article, having risen to 12s. 6d. a lb., had stayed there ad infinitum; but the natural law of supply and demand would make this impossible, and I doubt whether abnormally high prices can be good for the industry or trade as a whole, and in a company like ours we must look to the future as well as the present. I mean that, although it is highly satisfactory to have sold our present comparative small crop at a good figure, any abnormal increase in price such as would tend to increase the world's production, and so increase competition, must be detrimental to us in years to come, when we are producing large crops. Another thing, the figures recently published show that the high prices must have curtailed consumption to a considerable extent, the world's visible supply of rubber on the first of this month being 2,282 tons larger than it was a year ago, but it is satisfactory to notice that the position is now improving, as clearly shown from the fact that the deliveries for the last month exceeded the imports by 160 tons. The price which we obtained for our rubber during the financial year was 7s. 9½d. per lb. net, and the question which we are pondering and making calculations upon is the probable price which we are likely to obtain during the present year. In my opinion, prices in the spring went up on the American demand, trade being good and the motor industry flourishing, and home and Continental manufacturers being compelled to buy on the rise. Later on trade slackened off. The rate of exchange also during the summer touched a point which encouraged gold leaving London for New York, and manufacturers confined their purchases of raw rubber as far as possible to their immediate wants. At present the amount of gold held by the banks in New York is very large, money being wanted, as usual this time of year, for financing the crops, but when the wheat crop is disposed of trade should improve, and with cheap money, and with the advent of normal conditions, activity in the electric and motor industries will again force America into the market as a buyer of raw rubber. Some people look on the discount which has been ruling for plantation rubber as against hard Para with apprehension. I, personally, regard it in a very different light, for we have a fight before us, and to replace wild rubber we must sell a better and purer article at a lower price. This we are doing, with the result that we shall assuredly capture the trade, so I do not think we need be despondent, and I do not think the position of rubber or the rubber share market is quite so bad as the bears make out. Now, with reference to our property. I regret to have to inform you that our late manager, owing to ill-health, had to retire. On his leaving we procured a report on the estate from Mr. Maude, manager of the Cicely Company, and were fortunate in obtaining the services of Mr. Patrick Hadow as temporary manager, and I am glad to say that this gentleman has agreed to remain on for a time so as to give Mr. McCaull, our new manager, the benefit of his experience and advice. I am mentioning this partly because some of the figures, cost of production, etc., are Mr. Hadow's, who had not full charge during the whole of the financial year. The system of tapping, for instance, he changed from the old spiral method to the quarter-tree single herring-bone. This system, while preserving sufficient bark space for four years and enabling one coolie to tap up to 220 trees instead of 60 per day, has shown a large increase in yield, and the average cost of tapping since January works out, including "Mandors" and scrap pickers, at only 16 guilder cents, or, say, 3½d. sterling, per lb. This, gentlemen, is the most economical working which has come under my notice, but in the future I hope it will be even less, as in the estimate for the current year's expenditure, 15 cents has been allowed, and our estimate of crop is 200,000 lbs. dry rubber, which we are informed will easily be obtained. This is an average of 450 lbs. per acre, which is the acreage we shall be tapping, and as our trees are only planted about 100 to the acre, it means an average of 4½ lbs. rubber a tree. The estate appears to be remarkably free from white ants and disease, but a careful look-out is being kept for any sign, and immediately tackled, so I hope there is nothing to be feared. The factory extensions were completed in March, and although there have been delays, I am glad to say we have now got the new machinery installed, and the factory is now equipped with a suction gas engine of 75 h.p. and a battery of seven large washing machines, the old 35 h.p. engine being now only used so as to act as an auxiliary. Our new gas engine will, I am sure, result in a considerable economy, as charcoal, which is the fuel we shall use, can be procured for about ¼ cent a lb, and we now possess one of the finest and most up-to-date factories in the East. Our rubber, by the way, I should like to mention, won the first prize at the Singapore Horticultural Exhibition for the best rubber from estates situated outside the Federated Malay States. (Applause.) I think that is very satisfactory. As regards our accounts, these are again drawn up in the most conservative manner, one-half of the expenditure on the estates, management, etc., being charged to revenue, although, as a matter of fact, only about one-sixth of our property is as yet revenue-producing. All the expenditure in Singapore and in London has, as usual, also been paid out of revenue. Then, as regards reserve, although we have probably an ample reserve in our young rubber, we think in a prosperous year such as we have had, although not absolutely necessary, it is certainly advisable to strengthen our cash reserves. We, therefore, propose adding £2,000 to our reserve fund, and, after writing off £500 as depreciation on our buildings and machinery, our accounts show the satisfactory profit of £35,131 7s. 2d.—no mean achievement when one considers it has been accomplished as a result of, as I have already said, only about one-sixth of our planted area being tapped. We are also carrying forward £3,154 8s. 4d., which is a very substantial sum, and is considerably larger than that brought into the accounts. I now beg to propose that the directors' report and audited accounts be received and that the same be adopted. I also think, gentlemen, that this is an occasion when we should pass a hearty vote of thanks to our manager and staff. We are also much indebted to our agents, Messrs. Hooglandt and Co., in Singapore, and also to Messrs. M. P. Evans and Co., our agents and secretaries in London. (Applause.)

Mr. James C. Tate seconded the motion.

Mr. Morson said he thought the result of the year's operations must be highly satisfactory to all the shareholders, especially in view of the dividend which was being declared. (Hear, hear.)

The motion was carried unanimously, and the dividend, as recommended, was declared.

THE NEW AFRICAN COMPANY, LIMITED.

The fifteenth ordinary general meeting was held on the 6th inst. at the Cannon Street Hotel, Mr. P. G. Hamilton-Carvill presiding.

The Chairman stated that effect had been given to the reduction of capital authorised at the special general meetings held last year and sanctioned by the High Court. In accordance with the scheme of reorganisation, 97,600 shares were duly subscribed for at par. Since then the directors had been able to place a further 30,000 shares at a premium of £5,700, bringing the total issued capital up to £283,760. The profit and loss account showed a profit of £27,016, which had been carried to the balance-sheet. After deducting the loss brought forward from the previous year, there remained £24,938. The directors recommended the payment of a dividend of 5 per cent., carrying forward £10,750 to the current year. The reconstitution arrangements involved considerable delay, and it was not until some months after the present board took office last year that the company was really in the position of a going concern. The reorganisation left them in October of last year with a balance of free working capital of not more than about £20,000, and the profit mentioned had been made between that date and June 30 last—that was to say, in about nine months. The most important item in the accounts consisted of their "investments in mining land, and sundry shares, debentures, and participations," amounting to £277,997. The chief features of these investments were dealt with in the directors' report. With regard to the valuation of these assets, the appreciation in certain of the items more than compensated for any depreciation shown in the market quotations of some of the others, and the directors were satisfied that the amount which appeared in the balance-sheet was a safe valuation. Referring to the investments, he stated that the prospects of the Rooiberg Minerals Development Company were highly encouraging. The property was very extensive, and the section upon which operations were now proceeding occupied but a small portion. On the Welgedacht property the output of coal during the year had been regulated by the tonnage apportioned to that company by the Coal Owners' Association. When the gold-mining operations were in full swing the proximity of this coal mine would effect considerable economy in the working costs. In the gold section the shaft was being sunk, and had now reached a depth of over 350 ft. Mr. John Roy, of Johannesburg, represented the New African Company on the boards of the Rooiberg and Welgedacht Companies, and the shareholders were to be congratulated on having secured such a capable adviser. The Mozambique Company was now in a very strong financial position, having more than £300,000 of working capital in hand. In the New Egyptian Company the directors believed that the company held an improving asset. West Africa was a most promising field of their activity. Their interest in the Taquah Mining and Exploration Company and its offspring, the Abosso Gold Mining Company, was a very substantial one, and the directors had the utmost confidence that handsome profits would be ultimately realised. Having referred with satisfaction to the company's interest in the Taquah Central property and in the West African Enterprise Syndicate, the chairman remarked that the shareholders had no doubt heard a great deal in the past year as to the tin fields which were being exploited in the Bauchi district of Nigeria. The property now secured by the company comprised an area of 640 acres, and it was particularly well placed. He concluded by moving the adoption of the report and accounts.

Mr. Leama R. Davies seconded the motion, which was adopted.

RONEO, LIMITED.

The annual general meeting was held on the 10th inst. at the Holborn Viaduct Hotel, Mr. W. T. Smedley (chairman of the company) presiding. The Secretary (Mr. George E. Boraston) read the notice convening the meeting.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said that a considerable sum had been spent on additions to buildings and plant during the past year. These were rendered necessary by the large increase which had taken place in the turnover of the business. The figures of this business were very remarkable. Going back to the year 1900, in which it was established, every year had shown a steady increase over the business of the year before. The sales during the past twelve months had amounted to 24½ per cent. over the sales of the previous year, and 44 per cent. over the sales of the year before that, and there was every prospect of this rate of increase being maintained. The additions made to the plant and machinery had had the result of augmenting their output capacity to the extent of at least 50 per cent. An important improvement which had been made was that they now had their own foundry, so that instead of having to go into the market to buy castings they were now making their own, and were thereby effecting a considerable saving. On the establishment of branches during the year they had spent £4,526, and they had written off a sum of £2,062. During the past year Mr. Atkinson-Clark had been to India and had reorganised the Indian branch of the business with very great success, and as a result, partly of his work there and partly of work that had been going on beforehand, the company had procured some most advantageous contracts which would yield large profits during the current year. In the last report reference was made to the fact that the company was about to open up in South America, and he was glad to say that their opening up there had been most successful. Last year their trading profits amounted to £24,371, while this year they amounted to £29,457, or an increase of about 20 per cent. That was practically in accordance with the increase of the turnover. The allowance for depreciation had been increased from £1,800 to £2,376. The total deductions made, including the amount written off to branch establishment fund (£2,062), were £10,770, against £7,147 last year, which left a net balance of £19,792, against £17,224 last year. Already a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum had been paid for the half-year ended December 31 last, and it was now proposed to pay a further dividend at the same rate, making 10 per cent. for the year.

Mr. E. Trevor L. Williams seconded the motion, which was unanimously adopted.

The retiring director, Mr. Williams, was re-elected, and the appointment to the board of Mr. H. Atkinson-Clark was confirmed. A cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Augustus D. Klaber, the managing director, Mr. A. S. Newmark, and Mr. H. F. Atkinson-Clark, his associates in the management, and to the secretary, accountant, and staff. A similar compliment to the chairman concluded the proceedings.

DOLOK RUBBER ESTATES.

The statutory meeting of the Dolok Rubber Estates, Limited (Sumatra), was held yesterday at Cannon Street Hotel, E.C., Mr. R. J. Hoffmann presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said: This meeting will afford me the pleasure of not only expressing my own views, as one who has been connected for some years with what I might describe as the new rubber industry of the East, but also of inviting gentlemen who are intimately acquainted with your estate to express their opinions both as to the present and the future of the enterprise. I have had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of Mr. Sulger, our other vendor, and your board conceived that they could in no way better serve the interests of your company than by inviting the latter gentleman (who is a planter of great experience, and who has lived a lifetime in Sumatra) to go out and superintend not only the transfer of the property, but the reinstating of the officials formerly under their control into the control of the company. The care and the precision with which he has fulfilled the mandate given him has fully justified the confidence reposed in his appointment. Gentlemen, there may be many present who may have wondered why the statutory meeting has been deferred until now. Each country makes its own laws, and the Dutch Government, finding that so many of their valuable estates were passing under the control of English and other European directorates, deemed it necessary before those estates were actually transferred, from what I might also describe as the native holdings, that they should be fully and officially surveyed. This, in view of the heavy work thrown on all officials through the many properties which were acquired both here and abroad, entailed some considerable delay. In Dolok we soon discovered the advantage of Mr. Sulger's presence on the spot, for he has now managed to obtain authority for the transfer to be completed, subject to a deposit with the Government of the sum necessary for the survey, and hence it is that I am able to read you to-day a cable received from the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, through their Medan branch, as follows:—"Re our telegram of 29th August, transfer completed, title deeds in our possession (that is, in possession of the bank) in the name of Dolok Rubber Estates, Limited." (Hear, hear.) I am glad to tell you that, in the case of Sumatra, we are able to go on the register in the name of the local company. We need not form a subsidiary company, as in Java, and hold their shares. It is an awkward proceeding, and in our case we have been able to avoid it. We are not only in possession, but we have taken every step towards the fulfilment of the programme formulated in the prospectus. We are clearing and planting at this moment 1,000 acres, under the best conditions, with Hevea Brasiliensis, and, speaking generally, with regard to the estate, the prospectus and the prospects, I have no reason to doubt or hesitate in assuring you of our entire confidence of being able to realise all that has been put forward. (Hear, hear.) Having dealt briefly with the receipts and payments, the chairman continued :—Although the property was only taken over and paid for by the company on September 17, it has been working for the benefit of the shareholders since March 1, and I have had most satisfactory evidence as to the profitable nature of the business. When our financial year closes for 1910 I believe we shall be very little short of the calculations that were put forward in the prospectus by my worthy colleague, Mr. van der Steenstraten. I am extremely gratified in telling you that we have a most excellent and capable manager on the spot. Several parcels of rubber have already been sold, but the first to arrive since the transfer, some 1,400 lb., is now in our hands in London, and will shortly be disposed of, and we hear excellent reports from the estate, and, apart from the vigorous tapping that is now going on, we are just on the point of harvesting our heavy coffee crop. (Applause.)

Mr. Birenstihl said : We have a splendid climate in our Dolok district, with a temperature ranging from 70 to 96 degrees, and we are protected and entirely free from the dry scorching winds. You have been told that Dolok is a very cheap estate to work. This results from our having been very careful in the selection of our land, for its undulating character effects an enormous saving for us in drainage, drainage being one of the essential features for all land where you wish to grow hevea, as also coffee, the roots of which go down deeply into the soil, but the trees will not thrive if they are permanently in water. I have often seen estimates put forward up to £20,000 and £30,000 for planting 1,000 acres of hevea. Well, Mr. Bulger and myself would be very pleased to take a contract to plant you 1,000 acres and interplant with the best coffee for £8,000, and this would also include putting up all necessary buildings, coolie sheds, and other up-to-date appliances, so you may be quite content to rely that your working capital will enable you to plant the 3,000 acres, as foreshadowed in your prospectus. I do not hesitate to tell you that your directors will be able to live up to the estimates, and indeed your present coffee crop—the large harvesting of which is presently taking place—must surpass anything that I have ever known, and I may also say that I look forward to a very profitable time for this branch of our industry for several years to come. Mr. Sulger is vigorously carrying out the instructions of the board, in the preparation and planting of the first 1,000 acres of Hevea, and I do not care what may happen to the rubber market during the next few years, for I am certain that you should quite easily fulfil the programme set out in the prospectus, for you will be able to ship your rubber here for about 1s. per lb. cost. The Dolok estate is splendidly suited to the planting of cocoanut trees, and the nuts we grow are very large and of very fine quality. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Kok said he was a Dutch official, and as such was forbidden by law to hold any share in an estate lying in his district. He had known the Dolok Estates for some years, and visited them at least two or three times every year. It was not rocky country at all. He had himself made a canal on the estate in the course of his official duties, by which to carry water from one river to another. The canal was about 700 yards in length, and its depth was from 15 to 20 ft., and in excavating the canal to that depth he had not found any sign of rock. It was not necessary to have any artificial drainage. The question of water was an important one. If they had land in which water was found at a depth of 3 ft., the latex contained no rubber and the trees died after being tapped. On no part of the estate did water occur at a less depth of 10 ft. from the surface. (Applause.)

A vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the proceedings.

BUENOS AYRES WESTERN RAILWAY.

The ordinary general meeting of the Buenos Ayres Western Railway was held yesterday at River Plate House, E.C., Sir Henry Bell presiding.

The Secretary, Mr. F. E. Faithfull, having read the notice calling the meeting,

The Chairman said that the accounts were not so good as in recent years, but the falling-off in net earnings was only due to temporary causes. The season had been an unusual one, and late seeding, owing to prolonged drought, made the harvest just so much later. This spring the abundant rain gave promise of a normal season. The plague of locusts damaged the maize crops more than the frosts, and they spent £10,000 more in getting rid of them. The most important event of the year was that soon after the passing of their underground concession, the municipality granted a concession for an underground tramway line under the same streets, and on a better level than this company had. This completely changed their position. Both they and the Anglo-Tramway Company saw at once that the two schemes would clash and lead to wasteful expenditure, and they set to work to devise a scheme to avoid this, and in this they had been successful. Since the report was issued they had received a telegram stating that the Chamber of Deputies had passed their modified concession, and it now only awaited the President's signature and promulgation to become law. They had now got a concession which would give their customers a better service than the first one did, and they had saved the company from half a million to three-quarters of a million sterling of capital outlay. The work they had in hand and in prospect necessitated the raising of fresh capital. It was proposed to increase the capital from £18,000,000 to £20,000,000.

The report was adopted, and the increase of capital formally approved.

QUEER STORY.

THE KING'S SAVIOUR.

A Story of Lisbon.

MARIA SEGURA kept the little bright-green kiosk just outside the Cathedral. In summer she dispensed drinks, sweet agua and good Pilsener, and attractive liquid from an earthenware jar which wore a damp muslin jacket. On inverted tumblers were poised lemons to advertise her calling.

But Maria herself was the best advertisement. Her eyes were clear as the pellucid yellow-brown liquids which she offered, and there were shades in her hair, when the sun came creeping up over the Cathedral turrets and darted a ray across it, which made intelligent tourists stop and smile and talk about old pictures.

And Maria always smiled back. For one thing she had a merry heart, and for another her teeth were as perfect as a woman's teeth can be. She loved her post. On Sundays and smart festas it gave her such a good view of the élite trooping to Mass; and then it was handy for Henerique, who worked at a marble mason's in the Rua do Arco do Limoeiro hard by.

She and Henerique had been betrothed for a year, and there should have been a wedding by this time; but Henerique had lofty notions with regard to wives (just as he had lofty notions with regard to monarchy, being that anachronism of modern Portugal, a passionate Royalist), and he wished to tarry till he could carry out these notions to his satisfaction. Always in the dinner hour he ran across to the kiosk, and refreshed himself with a bottle of sweet agua and a chat (and often a kiss or two, if spectators were absent) before returning to his afternoon toil.

Now, while Maria was one of the belles of humbler Lisbon, Henerique was easily the handsomest lad in the town. So handsome, indeed, that Maria was a little worried about his looks. They were too perfect—people often told her so. He went by the name of "bom pouco santo" and sobriquets of that sort, which carry with them just the smallest hint of contempt.

Yet despite his ethereal features and beautifully curved mouth, Henerique was really in no wise effeminate; though it pleased jealous tongues to insinuate this as they prated about his "perfection."

Unhappily, Maria was over-sensitive, and these insinuations were gall and wormwood to her. At last her feelings came to a climax. It was hastened on by a remark from the mouth of Helena Barros, who sold sugar cakes down by the quay.

"Thou must keep thy pretty boneca in cotton wool, Maria, when once he is thine, lest harm befall his beauty—eh?" Then Helena had laughed disagreeably.

Maria's retort, which included a comprehensive and startling knowledge of Helena's past, was a masterpiece in its way; but though, hands on hips, she emerged victorious, she was very sore, and from that day she vented her soreness on Henerique.

She directed much cryptic conversation at him, the purport of which he was at first puzzled to divine. She enlarged frequently on the heroic deeds of men. There was Irmao do Calvario, for example, who had pulled three boys and one woman from the Tagus. Men Deos! behold a man there! Then Jogo Papelaria, in the Travessa dos Remolares; he had dragged a child from beneath a tramcar at the risk of his life. Even little Jose Moraes, near the Post Office—he was lame, too—had fought great hulking Eugenio Calvario for love of flat-faced Isabella Fazendas, whom Eugenio had insulted.

Then one day light came to Henerique, and these hints were no longer obscure, although at the time he made no sign that he understood them. Beneath his vest, with its thick coating of marble dust, his heart leapt like a dog which pulls at his chain seeking release. So this was the reason why Maria's eyes, as they looked at him of late across the little wooden slab covered with American cloth, could not give him quite all he desired. She was impatient with him—didn't consider him a man. She had listened to taunts perhaps from jealous women. Well, if that were all, two resolves he must make—a resolve of suppression and a resolve of accomplishment. A matter—a really wonderful and momentous matter which bade fair to hasten the wedding day—a joyful excitement which should have sent the warm blood rushing to Maria's cheeks, and which he made up his mind to tell her very shortly, he must keep to himself. And (here his beautiful mouth set itself in very firm lines) before the revelation was made he would remove, and remove beyond all possible shadow of doubt, that something—that intangible scarcely intelligible something in Maria's eyes, which just held in the inner shrine of it the least shadow of disapproval. He would silence those anecdotes of other men's prowess for ever.

On the morning on which this enlightenment came to him Henerique did not ask for the kiss which he never failed to claim when spectators were scarce. He seemed vague and preoccupied, as if serious matters were afoot. Maria wondered—wondered greatly what ailed him; then she half guessed that he had guessed, and being a woman she was angry because he noticed that which she had been trying to bring to his notice for months.

But Maria was destined to more disturbing emotions still. In the dinner hour of the day succeeding the one in which Henerique had received enlightenment, he did not come to the kiosk at all. He did not lean his beautiful face, powdered with the marble dust, near to Maria, and chat and drink lemonade and ask for a kiss. And the next day he was absent too, and the next and next.

Then Sunday arrived, when he was wont in the evening to call for Maria, and take her out to the gardens of the Avenida or to Belem; but Maria waited for him in vain. She was extremely angry, for now her pride was hurt. Henerique, who had always been her slave—willing to grovel in the dust at her lightest behest—was showing spirit. He had resented her criticism, and he meant to punish her for it. Pah! bah! sp-r-r-r! That for Henerique of the doll face! Maria snapped her slender brown fingers till they sounded like castanets, while she stood in her small room at home, waiting with a new kerchief on her head for his appearance. After all there were others—plenty of others who would be only too eager to understudy him.

So on the second Sunday she allowed Jogo Papelaria to take her out to the gardens of the Avenida. She wore her new kerchief, with its border of cornflowers, and she fondly hoped to meet Henerique, and openly to flout him; but Henerique wasn't there. A few days more and still he stayed away.

Then there followed a night—a night full of the stale odours of the hot day which had been—a night when it was difficult to fetch a normal breath, and when even Maria's healthy lungs felt oppressed.

It was time to close the kiosk: no more trade would be done. Maria shut the green wooden doors and turned the key with difficulty. The oppression was not quite all in her lungs, nor was it entirely concerned with the stagnant burden of the evening. There was a weight about her heart—a cruel stifling weight which would not move—a fierce sore longing—for—she refused to allow herself to confess that it was for Henerique. "It is the weather," she said to herself over and over again; "just the weather."

She turned to depart, carrying two empty Pilsener bottles in her arms. A small boy cannoned into her, running furiously. His face was smeared with black. She recognised him as the son of a neighbour. There was something about his panting hurry which arrested her attention. She caught him by the shoulder—

"Jose, why such haste? Tell me, is anything wrong?"

He shook his shoulder with some violence.

"Anything wrong?" he cried; "where are thy ears? Why, all Lisbon knows that the king has well-nigh met his death—on his way to the palace. Men Deos! It is over and done with now. As for me, I am running back to my grandmother with the tale—let me go!"

"A moment, Crianca, for God's sake—was the king hurt?"

The boy's mouth dropped in his extreme amazement.

"Thou art the last to hear what most concerns thee, it seems," he said. "No hair of him was touched—thy Henerique, who was in the crowd, sprang in front of the miseravel and received the revolver charge himself! Now, loose me."

He wriggled free of her detaining hand and was off like an arrow. Maria stood stone still—the two empty bottles clattered on the stone pavement and shivered to atoms.

"Thy Henerique, who was in the crowd, sprang in front of the miseravel and received the revolver charge himself. He had saved the king at the expense of . . .

"Not his life, Mother of God—oh! not his life!"

She was not aware that she had shouted this out aloud to the stagnant air. She began to run feebly a few steps—her impulse being to hasten she knew not whither; and then the terrific beating of her heart and a feeling of faintness held her stationary. What unthinkable horror might not meet her eye! They would perhaps be —— Literally she had not the courage to stir. Involuntarily her agonised gaze went towards the cathedral.

The door was open. A fierce yearning seized her—it expanded—it became an uncontrollable impulse. In extreme moments action was good, but prayer was better—had not Father Joao told her so? She would go in and say a prayer to Saint Anthony, her patron saint—a passionate prayer that Henerique the hero might still live—that somehow, whatever had happened, he might be restored to her. She tottered up the few steps and into the cathedral itself.

Now the cathedral was in process of repair, for fires are common in Lisbon, and only a few years before a great portion of the church had been burned down. The light inside was very dim—it came chiefly from the perpetual lamps which hung before the high altar. The sacristan was already beginning to go his nightly rounds. Maria staggered towards the shrine of St. Anthony, which stands on the left of the main entrance. It was very dark there.

But something prevented her from reaching the steps where she wished to kneel. She stood still, trying to make out what it was. Dimly she saw the coffin-like shape of a long deal box standing upon trestles. For one moment no chill of foreboding clutched at Maria's heart. Coffins left in the cathedral overnight are not uncommon. Doubtless some poor soul had by the permission of the authorities been carried thither to lie under the shadow of kind St. Anthony before he or she rested finally in the peaceful earth. Maria stood beside the thing, and to steady herself she rested one hand a little heavily upon it.

The lid was loose. This was extremely unusual. A pall should have covered the coffin—a heavy velvet pall.

Ah! this was no coffin—it was the rough ambulance box in which the sorely wounded of Lisbon are conveyed to hospital. The whole thing became plain before her at once. Someone—some poor soul who was in process of being taken to the hospital for treatment had died on the way, and pending identification they had borne him here.

Him! No! Christ of mercy, not him!

In a sudden frenzy of supreme horror Maria took the wooden lid with both hands and moved it so that she should see what the thing contained. And as she did so a moonbeam wandered through the coloured window of St. Anthony's altar and fell on a face—a face of exceeding beauty, with a small perfect nose and sensitive mouth. The eyes were closed, and the whole countenance, thick still in the marble dust of his calling, was the face of Henerique. Henerique, who had died to save his king!

Her agonised conjecture had been right. With an exceedingly bitter cry she fell down beside the long case, where the still figure lay in the light of the single moonbeam and the flicker of the perpetual lamps.

"Henerique," she wailed; "oh, Henerique! for the love of God, forgive me! Mother of Sorrows, it cannot be! He was mine—mine till——" And then in the extremity of her torture words failed her and she just knelt there, her eyes on the still face, her body cold as death.

"Henerique!" her voice came again—it was a strained whisper, and out of the gloom sounded a sudden answer.

"Maria!"

Maria lifted her face, white now as the face of the silent figure. She deemed it to be the sacristan come to close the doors. He was a friend of hers.

"Let me stay with him, good Chico?" she entreated, in a flat, expressionless voice, out of which all individuality seemed to have died; "it is all the happiness I ask of life—now—this one long night to watch by his side!"

"Maria!"

The voice came again. There was a youthful vibration in it. Assuredly it was not the sacristan, who was seventy and asthmatic. Moreover, strong arms closed round Maria and a shower of pet diminutives fell on her dull ear.

Then a sort of trembling eeriness possessed her.

It was Henerique—the dead Henerique.

"It is his spirit," she said aloud, "come to bring me the forgiveness I so sorely need."

"It is no spirit"—the voice had a ring of mirth in it now.

And then she struggled to her feet, still with those arms around her.

"Henerique," she cried, "but——"

No other word would come; a deadly faintness closed round her again. She pointed to the box.

"What is it?" she breathed. "Who is he?"

"Canst thou bear a story, little one?" Henerique asked, tenderly, out of the gloom. Maria controlled herself by a great effort, and faced this supreme joy born out of sorrow, and laid her hand in his.

"I can bear anything if thou art indeed safe."

"It was a miracle," he told her. "I flung his arm upwards and the charge went through my hat. But the crowd pressed me and I fell. At first they thought I was badly wounded."

"But this—this?" she persisted in an awed voice, and pointed again to the box.

"It was a secret, dear one. The Senhor Irmao, who is a sculptor of repute, saw me one day at my work. He had been commissioned to carve in alabaster the new St. Anthony, who is to stand here in the niche above his shrine. He said"—Henerique hesitated—"that my face was exactly suitable for his purpose. . . . At first, Maria, I was a little angry—I am so weary of my saint face—but the pay was so good—it brought our marriage nearer, and I consented. . . . I came one day to the kiosk meaning to tell you; but in your eyes I saw that which no true man stands. You despised me. You thought of me as the doll—the good little carved doll—not as the lover willing to die for you. I made a vow, heart of mine, that I would prove myself worthy before I spoke to you again. I have done so" (he said this quite simply and without affectation). "That 'the good little saint' should come home on the same night is merely a coincidence. Touch his face, beloved—he is really a man of stone."

Maria did so fearfully. The saint's face was a work of art admirably executed; and in that subdued light very life-like, or, rather, death-like. But it was hard and icy to her touch, and she was satisfied.

"But what led you here?" she asked, pressing his arms.

"The Royalists (thank God there were many in the crowd!) would have made a hero of me. So I slipped away—and here I came to say a prayer of thanksgiving."

"And then?" she asked.

"Then I was coming to thee, love of my life, for thy approval, which is more to me than the acclaim of a multitude."

Here the sacristan, who had heard nothing of the tumult outside, limped up.

"It is closing time," he growled. "Hast thou seen our new Anthony? By the saints, a lovely figure!"

"A lovely figure indeed," agreed Henerique and Maria together. And then they went out into the night, where the newsboys flaunted their papers and cried the marvellous tale of the King's escape.

BOOKS.

"QUOD ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus traditum" is certainly true, said Vincent of Lerins, is certainly false says a recent cynical authority. "It has been objected to the famous Vincentian canon which the Catholic Church takes as the criterion of faith, that it reverses the tests of truth as furnished by experience. What is believed by all men everywhere at all times is pretty sure to be false." The late Mr. Podmore, whose tragic death has left himself at the mercy of those spiritualistic experiences or experiments which he devoted his life to discredit, has, in his posthumous work, "The Newer Spiritualism" (1) given a hesitating verdict in favour of the Vincentian canon as applied to that cult. These spirit utterances, he says truly, are world-wide and world-old, and have been with us in some Protean form or other since "the first syllable of recorded time," and therefore, he concludes, there must be something more than mere imposture behind them. "From Pythian priestess to modern clairvoyant she has been an almost passive instrument to be played upon by minds other than her own, by the hopes and fears of the whole race of man." Even Mr. Podmore, who has all along been an advocatus diaboli in discrediting mediums and their controls, is compelled by overwhelming evidence to admit the inadequacy of telepathy as an explanation of some of the phenomena, since the facts revealed were unknown to the sitters at the seance. To take one out of many cases, the spirit of George Pelham, who had been killed in an accident in New York, suddenly intrudes into a seance in Boston, where Mrs. Piper, who did not know of his existence, was the medium, while a friend of the dead man, George Hart, was the sitter. After giving correctly his own name, the name of the sitter, and the names—both Christian and surname—of several of his intimate friends, George Pelham exclaimed about studs the sitter was wearing. "That's mine. Father gave you that. Father and mother together. Mother took them and gave them to father, and father gave them to you." His step-mother had as a fact—unknown to the sitter and, of course, to the medium—taken the studs from the dead body. Indeed, next to the spirits of those pillars of the Psychical Research Society, Messrs. Hodgson and Myers, this George Pelham's spook gave the most staggering evidences of his identity and of his posthumous knowledge. However, the most staggering of all the cases of communications purporting to come from the spirit world, which could not possibly have been telepathic in their origin, is that of the apparently incoherent messages from Mr. Myers in answer to Mr. Dorr's question "What does the word 'Lethe' suggest to you?" The answers of Mr. Myers seemed a mass of incoherent nonsense to the sitters at the seance, to Mr. Dorr himself, to Mr. Gerald Balfour, and to others who read through the mystic scripts where the words "Iris," "Cave," "Clouds," "Bow," "Banks," "Flowers," "Poppies," "Morpheus," "Ceyx," occurred without any apparent inter-connection. At last it occurred to Mr. Piddington to read Ovid through until he found in the eleventh book of the "Metamorphoses," hitherto unknown to him (as it was to all concerned except to the spirit of the scholarly Mr. Myers) the source of the cryptic allusions. Juno sent Iris to Somnus to bid him carry the news of the death by drowning of King Ceyx to his Queen, Alcyone. Iris prints her rainbow upon the sky and glides down to the cave of sleep hidden by dark clouds. From the foot of the rock flows the River of Lethe, and on its banks are poppies and innumerable flowers, from whose juice Night distils sleep. Finally Somnus sends his son, Morpheus, to impersonate in a dream the dead Ceyx. Mr. Podmore, who, it must be remembered, is always on the sceptical side, suggests that this particular legend, rather than the more familiar stories about Lethe, was deliberately chosen with the intention of giving a conclusive test. He notes also the significance of the choice of a legend in which the dead man is personated—Morpheus imitating the voice and gestures of the dead Ceyx. But, indeed, Mr. Podmore wavers like a ship in stays between many theories, all more or less inadequate, certain only that the phenomena are inexplicable by any known natural laws and even by the laws of telepathy so far as they are known. The shifty sub-liminal consciousness, as tricky, unprincipled, and irresponsible as a street Arab, could personate the dead certainly. It delights in personation, but it could not command the mind and memory of the dead. But neither could the dead, assuming the controls to have been the dead, command their own minds and memories! Hodgson cannot reveal the secret of his cipher. Myers is bewildered by his own special invention in life—the cross-correspondences. Neither Hodgson nor Myers can read his own test letters. Even such messages as could apparently come only from the dead are often unworthy of the dead, trivial, irrelevant, or expressed with the incoherence of a drowsy man half roused from sleep. A great inventor said to me a short time since that nearly all great inventions were stumbled upon incidentally and accidentally by an inventor in search of something else; and it is probable that the "newer spiritualism," in search of messages from may stumble upon a law of nature or a force in the human mind hitherto unimagined and unimaginable. This, at least, is suggested by the residuum of indisputable fact which remains when all the fraud and froth of spiritualism has been eliminated.

> The undiscovered country from whose bourn
> No traveller returns,

On re-reading in a volume Mr. Bernard Capes's "Historical Vignettes" (2), which delighted me on their first appearance in Truth, I realised how much truer fiction often is than truth! A photograph—e.g., which seems truth itself—is not so true a picture of a man as his portrait by a great artist, if only for this reason, that a photograph gives you the man as he was in a certain mood and moment, while the portrait gives you the quintessential essence of all his moods and moments which we call his character. The story of the music hall artist who brought down the house nightly by his imitations of the squeals of a tortured pig, while his challenger was hissed until he produced from under his cloak a real, live squealing pig, is always told against the artist and against the audience; whereas the artist and audience were right, and the live pig wrong! The artist gave the quintessential essence of the squeals of a million pigs, not merely the accidental squeal of an individual pig! A really great historical novelist will give you a truer picture of a time or of a man than a matter-of-fact memoir-writer who lived in the age itself and even in the company of the man. Now Mr. Bernard Capes's "Historical Vignettes" are portraits of his subjects taken at moments when their characters are brought out by some crisis as secret writing is brought out by fire, painted with a touch at once light and telling, swift and sure.

Mr. Robert de la Condamine's "The Upper Garden" (3) is not a book about gardening, "but rather about everything that a garden means to the artist, the wanderer, the saint, and the student." Its style is too self-conscious for my taste, which holds with Carlyle that "style should be as a beam of white light—invisible itself, but making all things visible." Those, however, who enjoy a style, of which I subjoin a specimen, will certainly enjoy also the super-refined thought it expresses:—

> The shades of oblivion are about her, she has sunk to the elaborate grass rather than knelt in her praying; she has strength to join her hands, so suavely lined, and thus she almost swoons, and she is holy and the future is half unconsciously about her.

Mr. De Morgan in "An Affair of Dishonour" (4) shatters a second British prejudice. In "Joseph Vance" and its immediate successors he disposed of the British conviction that no man after sixty can succeed in a flight of imagination, and in "An Affair of Dishonour" he disposes no less demonstrably of the no less deeply-rooted British conviction that an artist can be master of only one style. For in his latest book Mr. De Morgan transports you into an utterly different world from that of his earlier novels—into the seventeenth century and into the heartless and conscienceless world of the comic dramatists of the Restoration. Only by "spreading a privation of moral light over his creations"—to quote Elia's euphemism in palliating the worthlessness of the characters of the Restoration Drama—has Mr. De Morgan made his principal character even endurable. He is a thorough scoundrel, and the heroine in sacrificing to her infatuation with him honour, duty, filial affection, and every higher feeling, estranges your sympathy. Yet the story holds you tight in its grip from first to last, while some of the scenes, notably that of the duel and that of the naval battle between the Dutch and English, are painted by a master hand. Nor is the snobbish heroine of Mr. Horace Newte's "The Sins of the Children" (5) a sympathetic character, but her Père Goriot of a father is painted with a pathos which goes straight home to the heart. No one would grudge to such a heroine a little of the suffering at the hands of her own spoiled brat that she had herself inflicted upon her father; but of this salutary revenge of fate little is made, in spite of the title of the novel. DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

The latest volume on "London" (Black, 7s. 6d. net) has the double attraction of a wealth of pictures in colour and a very readable text. The author, Mr. A. R. Hope Moncrieff, has avoided the beaten track of the conventional guide-book and furnished an entertaining medley of description, history, reminiscence, and anecdote about the sights and life of the town, while the thirty-two full-page illustrations in colour are reproductions of the work of Mr. Herbert Marshall, Mr. W. L. Wyllie, Mr. Philip Norman, and other artists.

Mr. Belloc is well represented in the publishers' autumn lists. Besides two new volumes of essays, one "On Anything," the other "On Something" (he has already written delightfully "On Nothing" and "On Everything"), two of his old "books of the open air" are making a welcome re-appearance. Messrs. Constable have issued a new edition of "The Old Road" (price 7s. 6d. net), in which Mr Belloc describes in his own inimitable style the Pilgrim's Way from Winchester to Canterbury. The new edition is embellished with a photogravure frontispiece and sixteen admirable full-page illustrations by William Hyde. Of "Hills and the Sea" a new pocket edition is published (price 5s.) by Messrs. Methuen

Mr. Alston Rivers will publish next week a new book entitled "Bracken" from the pen of Mr. John Trevena—the only complete novel which the author will issue this year. In explanation of the title it is noted that the fern has always stood in folk-lore as the symbol of mystery, the roots hidden and permanent, the fronds transient and variable.

"War, Police, and Watch Dogs" (Blackwood, 6s. net) is a volume by Major E. H. Richardson, whose name has become familiar in connection with this subject. He shows how systematically other countries have taken up the training of dogs both for military and police work, and urges the adoption of similar measures here. The book has many illustrations.

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett are bringing out a new and cheaper edition (price 7s. 6d.) of Mr. Douglas Sladen's book "The Secrets of the Vatican." It will contain the pictures and plans that appeared in the original guinea edition which is now entirely out of print. The same publishers are issuing Mr. Jerome's play "The Passing of the Third Floor Back," with sixteen illustrations from photographs of the scenes. Hitherto the text of the play has not been obtainable in book form.

"Behind the Shoji," which Messrs. Methuen are publishing this week, is a new book on Japan by a lady who has lived in that country for many years, and had exceptional opportunities for observation. The nation's hidden characteristics and peculiarities are pointed out frankly and its shortcomings illustrated with anecdotes from life. Messrs. Methuen are also issuing this week Mr. Henry James's new book, "The Finer Grain," which consists of a series of five stories, and a new novel, "The Rest Cure," by Mr. W. B. Maxwell, the author of "Vivien" and "The Guarded Flame."

Mr. H. F. Nowell, of Cambridge Observatory, contributes a memoir of the late Sir William Huggins, formerly President of the Royal Society, to the October number of Science Progress (John Murray). The article is illustrated by a reproduction of the portrait of the distinguished astronomer, which the Hon. John Collier painted for the Royal Society.

To their series of shilling manuals of "Philosophers: Ancient and Modern" Messrs. Constable have just added volumes on "Nietzsche," by Anthony M. Ludovici, and on "Swedenborg," by Frank Sewall.

Much has been done to revive handicrafts during the last few years, but it still remains to bring it home to people that it does not need a definite centre before the craftsmen and craftswomen can get to work. For this reason Mrs. Priestman's book on "Handicrafts in the Home" (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net) will be useful. The author has shown how certain crafts not needing an expensive outfit may be done quietly in the home as a relaxation or as a means of earning pin money. It is free from technical phraseology, and is specially intended to help those who cannot afford either the time or the money for serious study. The book is American, and it would have been useful if reference to dollars and a few other Americanisms had been anglicised. The crafts which are recommended range from metal work, pottery, and home-made furniture to every kind of weaving and needlework, and the book is fully illustrated in a clear and useful manner.

ART.

THE ROYAL INSTITUTE OF OIL PAINTERS.

THE natural tendency of the Englishman to allow his foreign competitors a long start and yet himself to be in at the death is not confined to the submarine or to aviation. In art, as in science, theoretic or applied, the effectiveness of the English compromise with progress is little short of genius. There is perhaps no phase of British art more conventional, more Philistine, more behindhand than the lower middle-class Victorianism, which even now has not had its day. The public that instinctively prefers white paint and pink fittings to oak panelling and spaciousness is always with us, and indeed provides the best of all possible excuses for the pot-boiler; hence the pertinacity of smooth landscapes that never existed, curly-headed darlings whose hair never curled, and the best-clothes portrait of every description; hence also the more advanced, if less sincere, monstrosities which in the name of New Art make immaterial the point of view from which they emanated.

But the result of British Philistinism at an exhibition such as that of the Royal Institute of Oil Painters—an institution of thoroughly British traditions—is that by a consistent adherence to its middle-class ideals it is doing very much better work than is the case with a number of theoretically more advanced bodies of painters. Nor is the reason far to seek. Throughout the rapidly changing art-conflicts of the last decade or so it has remained true to its ideal, that ideal being, roughly, to supply Philistines, so-called, with work they really appreciate. It has thus escaped the eccentricities of "movements," while at the same time profiting a good deal by the experiments of such movements. A number of painters at the Institute have continued steadily with their own style of work, while keeping a watchful eye on that of their more enterprising brothers. The result is that, in true British fashion, they have arrived at the same point—even going one better at times—just as have the British sub-mariners, and as will no doubt shortly the British aviator.

A good many of the portraits exhibited have an interest apart from their artistic "raison d'être." Thus Mr. Sargent's "Marchioness Douro" is a reminder that he was perhaps himself the only person who did not say he had given up portrait-painting. The hair, dress, and pose of this portrait are very characteristic; the face more or less so, according as the painter regards it as a portrait or a satire. Mr. Lance Calkin's portrait of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain is sure of a welcome for its subject, if less for its execution. It is, I imagine, a work of some years' standing, and the likeness of the eye-glass is very striking. In point of fact, it is the bounden duty of every politician with intentions of becoming notable to provide his admirers with some such landmark by which they may recognise him without difficulty. Mr. Glyn SCRUBB & CO., Ltd., caution the public against the many injurious imitations of SCRUBB'S AMMONIA that are being offered, and draw attention to their having affixed the signature of SCRUBB & CO. to each bottle, without which none is genuine.

Philpot's youth adds very greatly to the interest of his work, which is full of possibilities of every kind. Mr. Philpot might become a very great painter—at times he is so already; he might become merely a melodramatist, his powerful effects hardening and conventionalising into mechanical production. His portrait of "Mrs. Fothergill and Daughters" is not his best work, being somewhat crude and incoherent. At the same time it conveys the sense of power which pervades most of his work, and which comes out very markedly in the tense, dramatic "Death-blow," also at the exhibition. Mr. Glyn Philpot has limited his particular convention by confining himself almost entirely to the Spanish type. It says much for his mastery of his material that the portrait-group conforms to this typification as much as does the "Death-blow," which, Spanish itself, needs no translation into English. The "Venus with the Dead Adonis" is a clever study in fore-shortening; the ring on Adonis's finger strikes a weird note; on the whole, however, the picture gains in eccentricity what it loses in originality. Mr. Lavery is exhibiting a portrait of a little boy, modelled somewhat on the style of Velasquez's solemn important little sitters; I noticed also Mr. Paul Paul's "Fables."

Mr. Hughes Stanton is the least disappointing of almost any B[illegible]h landscape-painter. While he hardly ever displeases, he also does extremely fine work. I do not particularly care for the "Athens: Sunrise," chiefly because Mr. Hughes Stanton manages his yellows and oranges much less well than the deep blues that appear both in "The Old Oak" and "Corfu." The foreground of the Athens picture is, however, a fine study of the purplish morning light, with its hint of later possibilities. "The Old Oak" is one of the charming idylls that he has made particularly his own. Mr. Bertram Priestman is another painter whose blue and green pastorals are well-known to the public. Mr. Priestman suffers slightly from a certain flatness, suggestive, rather, of the fresco than the oil-painting, but the open-air feeling about his work, and the sparkle of the sunshine in it, make it something to be anticipated with pleasure. Mr Henry Bishop, within certain rather narrow limitations, has brought his work as near perfection as is possible. The pictures of Tetuan place you at once on a personal, as opposed to a tourist footing with the place, and have nothing of the violent contrasts of foreignness; luminous and delicate, they make no clamant demands for appreciation. Mr. John Muirhead and Mr. Terrick Williams are responsible for some excellent work, as is also Mr. Swanwick, whose "After the Day's Work" has some of the feeling that Millet gave to his pictures. The Institute exhibition contains a large proportion of its customary Victorianisms, but it also contains a much larger proportion of really good work than has been the case for some years.

* * * * * *

Garden cities and suburbs, even street improvements, are looked upon with a certain suspicion by the man who dislikes cranks and at the same time over-estimates "atmosphere"—I mean of the non-hygienic kind. The complement of the Town Planning Conference, the architectural exhibition at Burlington House, is somewhat of a revelation. All over the world there seems to be a general tendency to combine beauty, utility, and hygiene; in Düsseldorf New Art has run amok, and the cottage residences of Hampstead, Letchworth, Bournville compare, on the whole, very favourably with the over-artistic art-cum-factory city. In Frankfort and Berlin exigencies of space, perhaps, have compelled a greater and healthier utility. Khartoum, following the American principle that a straight line really is the shortest distance between two points, has developed from the straggling village of Gordon's day to the well-planned, modern town of Kitchener fame. Paris, Chicago, Liverpool, London, are among the exhibitors, and visitors will note with interest the various schemes for Buckingham Palace, Piccadilly, and Strand improvements by Sir Aston Webb, Mr. Norman Shaw, and Mr. Leonard Stokes respectively. Mr. Speaight is again in evidence, though not this time by cutting corners out of Hyde Park. His scheme for Hyde Park Corner includes a National Opera in place of St. George's Hospital and a Shakespeare theatre just opposite, both of which seem at present to have something in common with the traditional castle in the air. The exhibition is of the greatest interest, even to the lay visitor, who, having seen it, will, no doubt, insist on letting his own house and retiring to an English cottage, with a chimney each end, and a green upon which he may raise his own geese and donkeys.

MUSIC.

THE Guildhall School of Music is confronted with the serious business of finding a new Principal. The announcement of Dr. W. H. Cummings's resignation will have caused little surprise, seeing that he is now in his eightieth year. The names of several musicians are being mentioned in connection with the appointment, of whom some are as obviously suitable as others are the reverse. Dr. Cowen has been spoken of, among others, and he would pro-

THERE is no recreative study that can give you the real pleasure that music will. But it is impossible to understand the full charm of music unless you play it for yourself. That is why the world's leading musicians have so enthusiastically welcomed the Pianola. They recognise that the Pianola is an enormous force for fostering and increasing the love of music inherent in us all. By giving everyone the ability to play it, the Pianola Piano (Steinway, Weber, or Steck Piano) affords everyone the opportunity to fully appreciate all that music means, and opens up a long vista of evenings spent in sharing the inspirations of the great composers. To know all that music can be to you, to experience to the full the fascination of personally producing music, you must own a Pianola Piano. bably be as strong a candidate as any if he chose to stand. The Guildhall School is not without its critics, some of whom, indeed, would prefer its ending to its mending. It has been called the white elephant of the Corporation, and it undoubtedly entails an annual loss, while the numbers of its students are declining year by year. It must not be overlooked, however, that both the Royal College and the Royal Academy are also in the receipt of annual subsidies while providing for fewer pupils.

There is no reason why the Guildhall School should not continue to do good work, though some of its methods might readily be improved. There is reason to believe that its administration is by no means so economical as might be wished, and in other ways there is room for reform. Now that a new Principal is to be appointed a convenient opportunity will present itself to make some desirable changes, and it is to be hoped that the individual selected will be chosen with this end in view. It is a question, indeed, whether a professional musician is necessarily the best man for such a post. A good deal could be said in favour of the appointment of a lay Principal of the type of the late Sir George Grove, who gave his attention mainly to the administration of the Royal College and left the actual teaching to others. But the difficulty would be to find a man of just this type. The Principalship of the Guildhall School of Music, with its £1,000 stipend and good pension, is quite an attractive one.

D'Albert's "Tiefland," produced by Mr. Beecham last week, was a disappointment. The work has enjoyed such exceptional popularity that something a good deal better might reasonably have been expected. It is, indeed, surprising that D'Albert, who has always been regarded as aiming so high and as professing such scorn for the idols of the market-place, should have been content to produce such an absolutely ordinary and mediocre work. His music could hardly be more absolutely undistinguished if it had been written by the obscurest Kapellmeister in the world. The popularity which the opera has enjoyed must be ascribed mainly to its story, though even this is very badly set forth, the various characters being afflicted with an almost Wagnerian propensity for narrating at length events already well known to the audience. Treated as a one-act "shocker" in the style of "Cavalleria" or "Pagliacci," the work would probably have been much more effective; as it is, it becomes inexpressibly tedious. It suffers further, moreover, from the preposterous length of the first act—lasting over an hour and a-half—though a break could have been made at the end of the prologue without the slightest difficulty. The craze of modern composers for writing at such inordinate length is an inexpressibly foolish one, and certainly does not help in the least to an appreciation of their music. The performance of "Tiefland" was excellent, Mr. John Coates singing finely in the title-part, while Miss Muriel Terry, replacing Miss Lemon at the shortest possible notice, made a great success in the part of Marta.

Last week's concerts were mostly recitals, interesting enough in their way, but not demanding much criticism, especially when the artists are so well known as Herr Kubelik, who played brilliantly as ever on Thursday, and M. Ysaye, who was heard on Saturday. Both artists had orchestras to support them, the New Symphony in the one case and that of the Queen's Hall in the other, and both had large and enthusiastic audiences. Mr. Goll, who was also heard during the week, is a pianist with a fine sensitive touch and a beautiful tone, though his playing sometimes lacks discipline and repose. At the Promenades a pleasant novelty heard was a set of variations for string orchestra on "The Vicar of Bray," by Mr. Ernest Austin. They are lighter in style than some of this young composer's music, but none the worse on this account, and they produced a very favourable impression. The point of introducing scraps of other well-known tunes in the last variation is perhaps not quite obvious, but the device admits of some quaint effects which amused the Promenaders. An orchestral sketch, entitled "Sunshine," by Dr. J. W. G. Hathaway, contained some pleasant music, too, though it hardly seemed to justify its title.

An article in the October Musical Times, by Ernest Newman, gives some interesting particulars, with musical illustrations, of Elgar's violin concerto, but it may be doubted if in a preliminary article of this description it was politic to lay on the butter quite so lavishly, even though one may take it as a good omen that such an exacting and fastidious critic as Mr. Newman finds it possible to write as enthusiastically as he does. It is difficult to judge of orchestral themes, especially when such a master as Elgar is in question, from scraps in short score, but some, at least, of those quoted offer plenty of promise. Incidentally, the curious will not fail to notice that Sir Edward's favourite direction, "nobilmente," which has provoked uncharitable comment on the part of ill-natured rivals before now, is much in evidence once more. But then Elgar is one of the few living composers entitled to employ such a word. Grove used to say what a sure and certain sign of a particularly beautiful passage was Beethoven's "espressivo." Elgar's "nobilmente" serves the same purpose.

I referred some weeks ago to the absurd efforts which were being made, presumably by interested parties, to work up a sensation over the so-called "Emperor" Strad, properly known as the Gillott Strad, which originally formed part of the G. Haddock collection, with a view to bringing about its purchase by the nation. As I then pointed out, seeing that the nation, through the British Museum, has actually refused to accept a whole quartet of Strads, namely, those bequeathed by the late Mr. J. C. Oldham, when these could have been had for nothing, the notion of buying a single specimen two years later was hardly one likely to be entertained. Nevertheless, puffing paragraphs continue to appear from time to time on the subject, the latest being one published last week, in which it was stated among other things:—

> The fiddle world will rejoice to hear that Kubelik is likely to be the happy possessor of this crown jewel of the great master's work.

This statement is a pure invention. There is not the slightest likelihood of Kubelik becoming the possessor, happy or otherwise, of the instrument unless the present owners of the instrument meditate making him a present of it, in which case I have no doubt that he would be delighted to accept it, for it is a very excellent violin; but unless this is their intention, it is a little difficult to understand how such an entirely unwarrantable statement as that quoted could have found its way into print.

THE THEATRES.

THERE has been little of moment in the theatrical world since I wrote last except two deaths, and I am rather afraid that the autumn air will prove distinctly unfavourable to one or two other productions. This season, in point of fact, promises to be a peculiarly trying one to all but the stoutest dramatic constitutions. Mr. Hall Caine's "The Bishop's Son" was the first to succumb, for it never took any hold of public favour, but its demise was speedily followed by that of "Young Fernald," Miss Millard's second production. The latter, in spite of obvious faults, was a rather charming little play, and I am very sorry that it should have had so brief a career, particularly if this prevents Miss Millard from making another experiment. What will happen to the Garrick Theatre is at present unknown, but Mr. Oscar Asche and Miss Lily Brayton, who have just returned from a brilliantly successful Australian tour, will at once take over the New Theatre, and will open next week with "Count Hannibal."

Miss May Robson, who, I understand, is shortly returning to America, appeared last week in another of those curiously American and naïve compounds of farce and comedy which seem to delight our Transatlantic friends. This was called "Maw; or, The Squab Lady," and, in case you do not know it, I may tell you that a "squab lady" is a lady pigeon fancier. "Maw," of course, is merely the American pronunciation of that terrible word "Ma;" and the squab lady is the wife of a professor who is making great discoveries in the way of liquid light, and would have been robbed of the results of his efforts by an out and out villain if "Maw" had not been resourceful enough to outwit the rogue. Miss Robson plays these frank, good-hearted, quaint-languaged women so well that I can only wish that some day some one will write her a play worthy of her powers.

Mr. W. H. C. Nation is once more tempting fortune at the Royalty. Three pieces figure in the programme, of which one, "The Kingdom of the Kennaquhair," is not unfamiliar, for I remember seeing it during this enterprising manager's last season. It is a burlesque of no great merit, but it seems to be popular—with Mr. Nation. The other two plays are both adaptations from the French. One is called "A Place Hunter Purled" and the other "The Cost of Cringing." Both are quite wholesome in tone, but their other merits are not very conspicuous.

Mme. Sarah Bernhardt was worthily honoured the other evening, or rather night and morning, when a distinguished company gathered at the King's Hall, Holborn Restaurant, at midnight to welcome her to England. Sir Herbert Tree brought her from the Coliseum. Sir Charles Wyndham received her, and Miss Ellen Terry was there to sit beside her, while the reception committee had for its president and vice-president the Countess of Warwick and Prince Francis of Teck. Among a host of other celebrities came the French Ambassador. I was at the Coliseum recently, and certainly the great Sarah must be very pleased with the success that she has made in "variety." The huge house was literally crammed, and I have never seen her play better than in giving the famous torture scene from "La Tosca." Crudely painful though this scene may be, I fancy English audiences appreciate it more than the scene from "L'Aiglon," in which she first appeared. The programme at the Coliseum just now is a very remarkable one, for, in addition to Sarah Bernhardt, you may hear Yvette Guilbert, who sings songs, French and English, with all her old wonderful charm.

I see that the English Play Society is blossoming out as the Diploma Play Syndicate, with a most imposing-looking list of "inaugural patrons and principal members," to say nothing of a "ladies' social committee" and a host of "play examiners and producers," and is inviting subscriptions for 2,950 preferred shares of £1 each out of a total capital of £3,000. The principal business of the company will be as follows:—

1. That of awarding Diplomas to such plays as pass the fixed Standard of Marks, this award testifying that, as a result of the judgment of the Examining Experts, the play under examination is considered worthy of public performance.

2. That of analysing plays submitted to the Company, and when necessary, advising authors upon such points of alteration or reconstruction as will assist to qualify their plays for the Diploma Award.

3. That of acting as Agents for Diploma Plays by submitting them especially to those London Managers who are already patrons and supporters of the undertaking, and also to such other sources generally as the Company considers likely to take up plays which have this special Diploma commendation attached to them.

4. That of exploiting Diploma plays by giving not less than one week's test productions or by continual runs, or provincial or other tours, according to arrangement between the Company and the Author.

I have every sympathy with societies which aim at helping young or unsuccessful playwrights to get a hearing, but I should like to know who are the practical people who will actually work on the board of management. All the "directors" mentioned are Mr. Lyddell Sawyer—who, I believe, founded the "English Play Society," Mr. Arthur Hands "dramatic manager," and Mr. Gordon Edwards "agent," and it will need very admirable management "to realise a profit even on the single week's test productions," and the company hopes to make a big profit on its various methods of working. I should like to hear the views of Mr. Frederick Whelen or some one of the managing officials of the Stage Society on this prospectus. One of the principal objects of the company is, I gather, to enlist the services of experts who will give advice to beginners because as yet "there exists no mould wherein this initial genius of the embryo author can be fashioned into the fulness of its form." This idea is, of course, excellent, but who are the people, I wonder, who are going to read and analyse the plays, fill in the "Standard Examination Forms," and point out the shortcomings of the work sent in? Any one who could really judge plays, and say which would succeed and which would fail, and what were the shortcomings which would make them fail would not be overpaid if he were to receive the society's entire capital every year.

All congratulations to Mr. Robert Loraine and Miss Marie Löhr, who I see are engaged to be married. Both are young, popular, and successful, and their future should be full of promise. Mr. Loraine, as we all know, can go far in the air, but there is no knowing how far he might not go on the stage if he were to give his mind to it. He has a sense of humour and a delightful personality, and London wants a new comedy actor-manager.

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

I WAS rather amused last week by reading that the Cesarewitch "is undoubtedly the most important handicap of the year." The Cesarewitch has lost a great deal of its old prestige, partly through the stupid parsimony of the Jockey Club, the race being now of trumpery value; and also through the competition of such much more valuable events as the Duke of York Stakes at Kempton Park, the Derby Cup, and the Manchester November Handicap. Even in the most palmy days of the Cesarewitch it was not "the most important handicap of the year," as it was then considerably behind the Chester Cup and the Cambridgeshire. At the present time more general interest is excited about even the Lincolnshire Handicap and the Royal Hunt Cup than the Cesarewitch, but the Cambridgeshire maintains something of its old prestige, being still unquestionably the most important handicap of the year! The decay of early speculation has greatly diminished public interest on the Cesarewitch, which of late years has been really a post betting race, and no large stakes have been won over it. Some writers are constantly bewailing the fact that early betting is pretty well extinguished, but backers who are so infatuated as to howl at the change which has come over Turf speculation may remember the epitaph on the famous brigand, in which the traveller is requested not to mourn for the robber, as, had be been living, the traveller would have been dead. Post betting is in every way an advantage for backers, and at present it is difficult to imagine that anyone fit to go at large would invest one penny on any race whatever until the day of running arrives.

Llangwm has gone to the stud, and his fee has been fixed at 47 guineas, which is a very moderate one, considering the exorbitant sums which are now demanded (and eagerly paid by doodles) for untried sires of fashionable breeding. Llangwm's sire, Missel Thrush, has left England for South America, having been purchased for a stud in the Argentine for 16,000 guineas. Llangwm was very unlucky in not winning the Derby of 1908, and there has never been a more overwhelming fluke in the history of the Turf than Signorinetta's victory in that race. Missel Thrush is by Orme out of Throstle, and he was bred by the late Duke of Westminster.

The official Free Handicap for three-year-olds is very interesting, and it was a wise change to postpone its publication until the autumn. Lemberg and Neil Gow head the list, each with 9 st. 5 lb., and Swynford is 2 lb. behind them and 2 lb. in front of Bronzino, who is estimated to be 1 lb. better than Greenback and 3 lb. in front of Charles O'Malley. As to the fillies, Winkipop has 8 st. 10 lb., and she is placed 7 lb. above Rosedrop, who so easily defeated her in the Oaks, and she is estimated to be 11 lb. better than Yellow Slave and 20 lb. in front of Thalia. When the two-year-olds of 1909 were handicapped, just twelve months ago, Neil Gow headed the list, and was estimated to be 3 lb. better than Lemberg. Charles O'Malley and Greenback were high up, each having the same weight, and Winkipop was a stone below them. Bronzino was allotted only 6 st. 4 lb., and Swynford was not included in the handicap.

Some of the daily papers have been printing all kinds of florid nonsense about the "immense fortune" of the late T. Loates, who was announced to have left "over a quarter of a million." I am informed that the property really left by Loates does not amount to a fifth of the extravagant sum mentioned. As a matter of fact, Loates held the position of a fashionable jockey for only a few years, and he could not by any possibility have saved a large fortune. There is always a marked tendency to exaggerate the possessions of racing men of every class, and there have been many cases in which an individual who is announced to have left great wealth behind him has really died worth but a mere trifle. We always hear a great deal about the winnings and gains in other ways of bookmakers, backers, trainers, jockeys, and others, but somehow such moneys have a tendency to disappear. There is an immense truth in Fielding's saying: "Men become rich not by what they get, but by what they keep."

Lord Derby acted very wisely in striking Swynford out of the Duke of York Stakes, for the St. Leger winner had a crushing weight to carry, and he could not have been expected to win, while it would have done him no good to run under such conditions. Swynford will no doubt be seen out at Aintree on November 9, when he is engaged in the Liverpool St. Leger, and he ought to find no difficulty in winning that race in spite of a penalty of 14 lb., as the best animals engaged also have extra weight to carry. It would be a most dunderhead blunder to knock Swynford about, as he is heavily engaged next season, and he may be capable of winning the Ascot Cup, but I rather fancy that if Nuage is all right he will beat all the English lot if he is sent over for the race. The Coronation Cup at Epsom is the earliest race next year for which Swynford is likely to be started, and his subsequent engagements include the Hardwicke Stakes at Ascot (which race he won this season), the Prince of Wales Stakes and Jockey Club Stakes at Newmarket, and the Eclipse Stakes. He may meet Lemberg in both the Newmarket races and at Sandown Park, but in the Ascot event Mr. Fairie is represented by Bayardo only.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon has decided to establish a new T.Y.C. race at Goodwood for three-year-olds and upwards, the distance being six furlongs, with penalties and allowances. The King George Stakes is to be a sweepstakes of £30 each, £10 ft., with £1,000 added. The race is to close on November 1, and it will be run for the first time at Goodwood next year on the second day of the meeting. A T.Y.C. race of this class was needed at Goodwood, where there are numerous events over long distances. It would have been an improvement to have made the sweepstakes an affair of £30 each, £10 ft. if declared by the Tuesday after the Epsom Summer Meeting.

Lord Falmouth's filly, Mary the Second, who made an unsuccessful début at Doncaster in the race won by Black Potts, was marked down by some good judges as likely to win the Cheveley Park Stakes at Newmarket this afternoon, but she has been struck out. I suppose if Mary the Second is all right that she will start for the Moulton Stakes on the Cambridgeshire day, and probably the Rous course will suit her better than the Bretby Stakes course, over which to-day's race is run. Mary the Second would receive 12 lb. from Meleager. Lord Falmouth also has Invicta, winner of the Newmarket Triennial, in the Moulton Stakes, but she would not beat Meleager at the weight, on the First October running.

Scarcely a week of the racing season passes without some of the sporting papers recording that horses have been engaged in races for which they are not qualified. It seems to me that the Stewards of the Jockey Club should long ago have framed a rule imposing invariably a smart fine upon both the person making the inaccurate entry and the official who complacently accepted it. Some such penalty would stimulate all the parties concerned to more care, but at present there is no invariable punishment for this slovenly muddling, which sometimes occasions much trouble. The blundering at the Curragh in connection with the Corinthian Plate went unusually far, and a cloud of imbecility appears to have descended upon everyone connected with the affair. The Corinthian Plate was a race for four-year-olds and upwards. There were only six entries, which included two three-year-olds, one of which, St. Dunstan, proved the winner. An objection was promptly lodged, and the colt was disqualified, the race being awarded to Marble Hill, who finished second. Next day it appeared that Marble Hill also was not qualified to start, so he, too, was put aside, and the stewards declared the race void, which was the only course open to them with a satisfactory termination to a very muddy-minded series of transactions. The stewards would even have done better if they had fined both the persons who entered the horses which were not qualified and the official who received the entries, and caused them to be printed. Errors of this kind are unpardonable, for only a mooncalf can deliberately enter a three-year-old for a race which is limited to four-year-olds. Such mistakes, moreover, open the door for gross frauds, by which both backers and bookmakers may suffer seriously. I must add that the conditions of the Corinthian Plate were a perfect marvel of complication, and anything more perfect in that line can scarcely be conceived.

Pietri, Seaforth, and St. Nat are generally considered to be the best two-year-olds of the season. It seems as if Hair Trigger II. should be added to the list on her running with Wrinkler, remembering that at Doncaster Pietri could beat the Duke of Portland's colt by a head only. As to the colts, Pietri and Seaforth might meet next year in the Two Thousand, but Mr. McCalmont's colt is not entered for the Derby at Epsom. Pietri may meet St. Nat, the Derby being the first three-year-old engagement of Mr. S. Joel's colt.

Writing a fortnight ago about the Imperial Produce Plate at Kempton Park, I predicted that this valuable stake would be won by Prince Palatine, and last week I again gave Mr. Pilkington's colt a plumper. Pietri was the general tip for this race, but it was impossible to understand how he could be reasonably expected to give 10 lbs. to Prince Palatine after his close race with Wrinkler at Doncaster, followed by the defeat of the Duke of Portland's colt at Newmarket. It was still more wonderful to find St. Anton or Meleager announced as the probable winner. I read an elaborate dissertation on the race in a morning paper which did not contain any mention of Prince Palatine! This colt was much fancied for the £5,000 stake at Sandown Park in July, which race was won by Cellini. It was stated in TRUTH on July 27 that Prince Palatine "had been very well tried, and his success was most confidently expected," but "he was much interfered with in the race, and never had a real chance of winning."

"I would not attach my name to any invention which I had not thoroughly tested and proved; and especially have I concerned myself in reference to these instruments for Inhalation which I have so unreservedly recommended to those who suffer as I have suffered."

There is a great demand from all parts of the world for the "Pipe of Peace," which is the name given by Sir Hiram Maxim to his new invention, an inhaler by which he has relieved his own Bronchitis and throat troubles.

An illustrated booklet has just been published giving the full history of these inventions. It also contains some valuable information on Hay Fever, Asthma, Nasal Catarrh, Bronchitis, Coughs, and most diseases of the Nose, Throat, Bronchi, and Lungs. All sufferers are invited to write at once for a free copy to Sir Hiram Maxim's sole licensees, Messrs. John Morgan Richards and Sons, Ltd., Dept. X, 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C. The "Pipe of Peace" and the Maxim Inhaler can be purchased at all principal Stores, Chemists', &c., and at the 350 branches of Boots Cash Chemists, throughout the United Kingdom; in all European Capitals, and in India and the Colonies; in Australasia, of Messrs. Prince Palatine ought to have won very easily on Friday, but Wootton appeared to ride a miserably bungling race, and the colt got dreadfully messed about, so that he was nearly beaten. Under the circumstances he was decidedly lucky to win, as he appeared to be hopelessly shut in. Phryxus began slowly and was never dangerous. The Manton colt may win the Prendergast Stakes at Newmarket to-morrow. Prince Palatine is an exceedingly fine colt, and if all goes well with him he ought to make a very good three-year-old. It must be remembered that the Kempton Park race was run over six furlongs, and it requires a fair stayer to win over this course. Prince Palatine is not engaged in the Middle Park Plate, but he is in the Dewhurst Plate, and Seaforth is not entered for that race.

The field for the Duke of York Stakes was much smaller than had originally been expected, as several horses were withdrawn, owing to the hard state of the ground at most of the training quarters. Willonyx was the great fancy at the finish, but some of the Newmarket people were confident that Wolfe Land would win. This colt ran well in the St. Leger, but ten days later he considerably disappointed his followers by being beaten for the Prince Edward Handicap at Manchester. Hayden was a strong tip, and he ran creditably, but Buckwheat carried off the honours of the race, as he finished a good second with 9 st. 3 lbs. It was most satisfactory to see the places all filled by heavily weighted horses.

Grey Spinner was so general a tip for the £1,000 Nursery that 2 to 1 was eagerly taken at the finish in a field of fifteen. Criton, who had been much fancied at Newmarket for this race, won easily at the finish, the favourite being third.

There will be racing next week at Gatwick, Newcastle, Thirsk, Sandown Park, and Stockton. The only sport of general interest will be at Sandown. There were thirty acceptances for the Sandown Foal Stakes of £2,000, and I see nothing in the list that is likely to beat Lemberg. The managers of this meeting have set an excellent example to the Jockey Club by abolishing the stallion allowance for horses which have won £2,000, a salutary reform which was long ago recommended by Truth. We shall not, therefore, see the Derby winner claiming an allowance of 4 lbs., and Charles O'Malley has lost 15 lbs., and Yellow Slave one of 12 lbs. There are seventy-two acceptances for the Great Sapling Plate of £1,000, and this will be one of the most important two-year-old races of the season, if it brings out Seaforth, Pietri, Prince Palatine, and Hair Trigger II., the entry also including Tullibardine, Night Rider, Phryxus, Romeo, and the Lady Frivoles filly.

CRICKET AND RUGBY LEGISLATORS—GOLF.

The Red Rose of Lancashire having failed to provide a satisfactory solution of the problem of settling the county cricket championship, the White Rose of York comes forth and propounds another scheme. Whatever may be the thoughts of those who evolved the new plan, they are singularly incapable of using words that accurately express their intentions. The scheme may be summarised thus. There are to be two points for a win, one point for leading on the first innings, drawn games are not to count, one point each for a tie, and then the figure to be the percentage of points gained to the highest possible that the team might have gained. It seems to be understood in some quarters that the one point for leading on the first innings is to be scored if the game is drawn. But that view is inconsistent with the statement that drawn games are to be ignored. And the practical illustration that is given of how the rule works leaves this point far from clear. It is said that the scheme has been favourably received. Its primary object is to stimulate public interest by making the first innings of a definite value. In the hope, therefore, of getting a gate the counties are apparently prepared to inflict on each other a mutual injustice. One county leads on the first innings, but in the end it is beaten. It scores one point and its opponent gets two points. One must suppose the counties know their business best, but one may really doubt if people will flock to see a first innings played by each side simply because a point depends on it. Nor are they likely to trouble to go if it is a certainty that one side has the point. They may, too, very well feel disgusted that a system of scoring has been adopted which allows the toss to decide not merely the match, but another point as well. One may respectfully doubt if all these points and percentages add to the gate at all. If a county can show bright and keen cricket people will come without worrying about the position in the table. If, however, the team is a rotten one, or if it is really good, but has batsmen who toil after averages and bowlers who are content to bowl persistently on off-side theories; if, in other words, there is a deadly dulness and a sluggish sameness about the team, the public stays away. All these little noughts and crosses may incite the players to dashing play, but the average man who makes the gate money is not deluded by them. If games are too long and protracted, why not decide on each innings? Then the second innings could be the return match. More excitement and more gate.

There is a feeling of unrest in Rugby Union football circles. Serious changes are proposed in the game. It is said that the colonists want the changes. Well, if we are to do everything the colonists want us to do life will not be worth living. The game is to be divided into four quarters, so that with the three rests the play may be faster; on a throw-in the nearest player from touch must be five yards out; the mark, or, rather, the necessity for making a mark, is to be done away with; and the referee is to put the ball in the scrummage. These alterations as to touch and time are simply gate-money innovations. The game will be faster; the public will come to see it. That is the view. How they do run after the public in cricket and football! These authorities are just as bad as political flat vote-catchers. The real game does not worry them. The maintenance of its traditions does not trouble them. Gate money is all that appeals to them. Opportunism is their policy.

There is only one sound suggestion among the lot, and that is that the referee should put the ball in the scrummage. And the reason for this is that the ways of halves are so wily, and it is such good sport to commit illegalities on the blind side of the referee, that strenuous legislation in this particular is necessary, especially with reference to colonials and teams from a gallant little locality. The game can certainly be ruined if the ball is placed unfairly in the scrummage. The consequential whistle-blowing if the offence is detected wastes time. Whether or not the referee will be able to put the ball in satisfactorily and look after the play at the same time remains to be seen. It may be necessary to employ the linesmen for the purpose. These, however, are matters of detail. But the proposal to increase the intervals between play is entirely unnecessary.

Among Rugby football matches the two outstanding features of Saturday's play were the severe beating the Old Merchant Taylors gave Blackheath and the victory of the Scottish over the Harlequins. The latter was a bit of a surprise to the spectators. But two fine footballers made the Scottish side. These were Cunningham, last year's Oxford captain and International, at half-back, and Buchanan, who can play anywhere outside, and who will be up at Oxford this term at full back. The Scottish forwards carried the scrums, their defence was sound, and the Harlequins had no chance of bringing off one of their combined and yet individualistic attacks. In the other match the Old Merchant Taylors, after the first quarter of an hour, simply romped over Blackheath, and gave them the severest beating a metropolitan club has given them for some years. They scored six goals and a try to nothing. Raphael scored from full back, and the whole three-quarter line played admirably together. Cheeseman and Ryan, behind a fast, bustling set of forwards, had quite the upper hand at half-back, and Allen in the three-quarter is well worth looking after. The Old Boys are a popular team, and their success and that of the Old Leysians have made Old Boys' clubs flourish in London. These clubs set the fashion.

While hockey flourishes one cannot help regretting that the Molesey Club has passed away. It was one of the pioneer clubs at the game. But no serious effort was made to get new members, and the old ones stayed on too long. The complaint is often heard that in hockey clubs the younger members get no chance of promotion, and that the veterans keep the first team to themselves. Such policy is bound to have a bad effect in the long run, not merely on the club, but on the game. New members must be looked for and be given a chance. Youth will tell.

* * * * * *

As a general rule one objects to a newspaper advertising itself by means of sport. But there is at least one exception to this objection, and that is the £240 tournament provided by the News of the World for the Professional Golfers' Association. It is not too much to say that without this tournament that excellent association would have ceased to exist. The prize offered is substantial. The preliminary and final rounds give younger players an opportunity of making names for themselves. There is therefore a big incentive to men to join the P.G.A., which by its tournament gives its members an opportunity of advertisement that materially helps them to acquire good posts in the golfing world. This year the final rounds were played at Sunningdale in lovely weather. Mr. Colt, the club secretary, and Mr. Mieville, the secretary of the P.G.A., made admirable arrangements both for players and spectators. The public were there in thousands. They expected to see new players come on. They wanted to see how Taylor, with his damaged wrist and without practice for a couple of months, would get on, and then there were men like Robson, who had first made a name for themselves in previous tournaments, to be watched. The finalists were Sherlock and Duncan. Sherlock at Stoke Poges headed the list in the southern section. He is not really a young man. He is only four years younger than Taylor. Since he left Oxford and went to Stoke his long game has improved enormously; he is at least thirty yards longer with his wooden clubs than he used to be. He has always been known as a steady player and fine putter, and he was certainly a model of steadiness at Sunningdale. Compared with Duncan, his passage to the final was not difficult. He had to meet Herd, who had only just beaten Ray, and although he led by two at the turn he was all square at the eleventh. Tnis did not upset him. He was still long and steady and never off the pretty, and he won by 3 to 1. The second half of the tournament list gave the best play. Taylor had not had seven days' play in two months. In the morning he was out in 35 and in the afternoon in 36. Robson played grandly, and he was beaten at the nineteenth hole. Taylor had shown some of the finest golf of the day. Next day his wrist was stiff and he was beaten by a youngster from Chester, Hughes, who is twenty years old and not 5 ft. 6 ins. high. This young fellow was one of the discoveries of the tournament. He has the nerve needed for a great player. He beat Taylor by 3 and 2, and followed this up by taking Duncan, who had beaten Ball, to the nineteenth with a following of 2,000 spectators. Duncan, in those two rounds, was playing superbly. Perhaps the finest match in all the rounds was that between Tom Ball and Harry Vardon. A long putt gave Ball the eighth in two and put him two up. Vardon was three down and seven to play. His play was perfection. He halved the round, doing the second half in thirty-three strokes. Then Ball won the twentieth, laying a forty-yard running up shot stone dead. The final was disappointing. Duncan's hard games had told on him. He was off his game altogether. He could not keep straight. Sherlock kept steady, but towards the end of the first round he seemed affected by the erratic play of his opponent. However, he finished off the first round three up, and won by eight up and six to play—rather a fizzle out to a good week's golf.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

UNREASONABLE INSURANCE CLAIMS.

MOTOR-CAR insurance is a delicate subject, and there is no doubt that when it comes to the case of claims the insured does not invariably get the treatment which he thinks he is entitled to from the companies. This is no justification, however, for making unreasonable demands, and I fail to share the indignation of a well-known writer who, in a recent number of the Autocar, taking up the cudgels on behalf of an aggrieved owner, waxed eloquent over what he clearly regarded as a very bad case of unfair treatment and sharp practice.

The account of the matter is not too lucid—it would be interesting to have the company's version as well—but, apparently, the owner concerned took a humpbacked bridge at such an excessive speed that "his wheels left the road and the consequent shock split his woodwork, gaped his doors, and generally upset the body." The narrative continues:—

> He applied to his insurance company for indemnity, and the answer he got was that there was no liability for "mechanical breakdowns."

On the face of it there seems to be nothing unreasonable in this answer. Either the owner was insured against such incidents under the head of "mechanical breakdown," or he was not. Apparently, from the company's answer, he was not. How, therefore, could he expect to recover? "Mechanical breakdown" is a recognised risk which is included in the policies of some companies—the Car and General is one—but not of all. It has always struck me as an exceedingly hazardous kind of risk—from the company's point of view, since the liability involved is obviously so vastly more extensive than that entailed by damage resulting from "accident" in the strict sense of the term. Whether it is a wheel that collapses or a propeller shaft that fractures, it is a "mechanical breakdown," and the company accepts the responsibility. Any sort of failure on the road not due to ordinary wear and tear would, in fact, seem to come under this comprehensive head.

From the owner's point of view the provision is obviously an extremely useful one to have in a policy. But as in this case the owner had not taken the precaution of insuring against this particular risk, on what earthly ground can he complain of their refusing to indemnify him? Did he think that the company would send him a sympathetic letter saying that they were extremely sorry to hear of his little accident, and that though he was not protected against such mishaps, they would none the less have much pleasure in seeing him through and paying his bill? Commercial corporations cannot afford to indulge their philanthropic instincts in this fashion. Even if he had been protected against "mechanical breakdown," I can understand any company thinking itself justified in demurring to paying for an accident brought about by such culpable negligence as that suggested in the case in question. Protection against "mechanical breakdown" does not mean, I take it, that you can drive your car into a brick wall for the sheer joy of the thing and then claim compensation.

A second case quoted by the same writer is hardly more impressive.

> The injured owner in this case bought a new car fitted with a new idea in brakes, and, shortly after he took charge of it, had occasion to slap them on hurriedly, with the result that the car slewed round into a horsed vehicle, smashed it up, upset everything, and the horse bolted, ruined the harness, and generally did as much harm as was possible short of sudden death.

The melancholy story proceeds:—

> My friend communicated the sad news to the well-advertised company he has insured with for some considerable time. Imagine his consternation when he received a lawyer's letter informing him that since the accident took place by his default, the company was not liable, and could not be called on to pay anything at all towards his expenses.

I hold no brief for the insurance companies, but this case leaves me as unmoved as the former one. As to the legal aspects of the matter I express no opinion. In any case it would be necessary to have (1) a somewhat less sketchy account of the accident, and (2) to see the owner's policy. Some companies refuse to accept liability for accidents caused by carelessness or negligence, and insert a clause to this effect in their policies. Apparently the owner in question had a policy of this kind, since otherwise he would certainly have been able to recover. The question at issue therefore becomes simply one of fact—namely, as to whether he was or was not careless, and on this point even his own statement engenders suspicion, to say the least. We know that individual who "slaps on his brakes hurriedly," and in the result smashes into neighbouring vehicles. It is suggested that the particular brakes used were at fault, but one would like to have the maker's evidence on this point. Anyhow, the presumption is from the statement of the case that the insurance company has the law on its side, and it seems to me a pretty fair assumption that, in spite of the hysterics of the owner's excitable champion in the Autocar, it has reason and justice as well.

The amount of attention which has been bestowed of late on that most sensitive detail of the automobile's organisation, the inner tube, has been remarkable. There have been liners, shields, protectors, and reinforced tubes without end, and if most of these have not succeeded in establishing themselves in favour, it is only because in the matter of tyre inventions, as in all others, it is a case of many misses to few hits. Now, there has been added to the list the Searle "unburstable" tube In this case the rubber is strengthened by a fabric in a very ingenious way so devised as to admit of the necessary expansion of the tube without injury to the fabric, and in the result it is possible to inflate the unsupported tube to a pressure of 70 or 80 lb. without its bursting. Such a pressure it withstood during a recent R.A.C. test, in the course of which it was subjected to some further searching experiments at Brooklands, and from which it seems to have emerged with a gratifying amount of success.

Particulars are published of a system of braking for motor cars operated by compressed air, of which considerable hopes are entertained. By means of a pump driven by the engine, air is compressed and stored in a reservoir. Pipes communicate with pistons operating the brakes. By moving a small handle, the driver admits air to the pistons from the reservoir, and the usual brakes are applied. If he puts the handle further over, serrated surfaces are brought into contact with the road on each side of the car by means of levers, and a very powerful braking effect is produced. By further moving the handle the pressure is released. The device is useful, it is claimed, not only as a powerful means of braking, but also for the prevention of side-slips. What seems rather doubtful, however, is how those "serrated surfaces" would appeal to the authorities responsible for the preservation of the roads.

WOMAN.

LETTERS TO MY MOTHER-IN-LAW.

DEAR Mrs. P.—James and I have both been wondering whether you can be the "D. Pott" of the cottage woman's petition to the Queen about motors. If this is so, I rather wish you had consulted us first. I know how difficult it is for you to get my father-in-law to realise that there is a social side to good works, and his prejudice against those he calls "swells" has always struck me as being a little bit snobbish, considering how rich he is. But the working of the motor petition was a real opening for you and the girls, and James and I both feel how unfortunate it is that it has missed fire from mismanagement. You know, no real village matron ever complains of shut windows, nor is village sleep of the kind that can be disturbed by motors. Children, it is true, get run over now and again, but every motorist knows that it is entirely their own fault. Also, it need not necessarily be a disadvantage. I once knew a goose who lived in Brittany, and made motor-outrages a source of regular profit to his owner without very much discomfort to himself. One of my friends was motoring through the village rather recklessly when he was dismayed to see a large goose walk across the road just in front of the car; he tried to save it, but it was too late. Being a humane man, he paid the owner handsome compensation. He had not proceeded a kilometre on his journey when he was overtaken by another car, from whose owner he learnt the sequel. No sooner had he paid and started on, than the dead goose, lying limp and lifeless in the road, lifted its long neck without moving its body, and gazed cautiously after the disappearing car. Twice it did so, each time letting its head fall back deader than before. And it was only after the car had turned the corner of the road that it rose to its feet, shook itself, and rolled vociferously into the farmyard to receive its due reward. Of course, a good deal of training is necessary to acquire any degree of proficiency in being run over, but after all, what is a mother there for? I very much wish, dear Mrs. P., that you had been willing to avail yourself of my suggestions before embarking on the petition.

By the way, I should be so grateful if you could make James see that I really do know more about some things than he does I have been having great difficulty in persuading him not to begin pheasant shooting too punctually. Dukes and earls, you know, quite frequently postpone their shooting parties to suit their personal convenience. If it is absolutely necessary to impress his less fortunate friends and relations then I reluctantly agree punctuality may be the soul of pheasant shooting. But James is handling a gun for nearly the first time in his life, he still talks of "brace" and "bag" and "potting" with insecurity; his brand-new shooting outfit is still offensively brand-new, and he said something about getting a "12-bore" (!) the other day for the occasion. He gave in to me, but rather sulkily, and I was disgusted to get two letters on the 3rd thanking me for "the beautiful pheasants." I only trust the birds did not arrive at the recipients' houses before the second post on October 2 at the earliest, and that somebody bit hard on a shot or two. I know of a poulterer who lost a large and profitable second-post connection through over zeal, catching the six o'clock post on the 30th so that the birds arrived, as appeared later, some hours before they had been shot. It is just these little details that matter so much.

James took me to the Booker Washington lunch last week—you might tell my father-in-law of the keen interest he maintains in everything aboriginal, and I think he was a little disappointed to find the Doctor anything but a full-blooded negro. There was so much heart-burning among the people who did not sit next to the hero of the occasion. In India and West Africa people are certainly less egotistical. One woman put on a brown dress on purpose, she said, to tone in with Dr. Washington's complexion. I was immensely impressed by the man. He said that whereas the white had only got to America with every possible difficulty, the negro had been pressed to come, had even had special ships sent to fetch him. I never thought of it that way before. But I don't think my father-in-law would approve of the Doctor's methods with his black students at Tuskegee. He teaches them to work—I wish he would take my new second housemaid for a month or two—which is really no more than they did before they were freed, and certainly isn't very democratic. Why, my grandfather used to expect just the same thing of his servants, and my father-in-law has spoken of him again and again as a "nigger driver" and a backwoodsman. So that Dr. Washington is rather old-fashioned, in spite of all the fuss about him. James says what can you expect? The lunch was excellent.

Do you know, I think James feels he has a real vocation for Parliament, and he tells me there are several vacancies at present. But he very naturally does not like to worry his father about the extra expense. Of course, we should be obliged to have a new motor, but it would be all in the Nonconformist interest. I should want some clothes, too, if I am to sit on a platform properly. I am not sure whether it would not be advisable for James to drop the Pott and write his election address under my name. Carteret has more syllables, and in these democratic days a name counts for so much. James is studying up all sorts of international questions in the smoke-room. He was much pleased to see that the Chinaman is to have a guillotine, for, as he says, death is after all the most important thing in life. He says it shows how far-reaching is the spread of civilisation, for it seems also that our Government have recently bestowed upon every West African nigger the right to be properly hanged, instead of being shot as heretofore. My father-in-law has always had so much sympathy with aborigines that I am sure he will like to hear James's views. I have heard of a Panhard, practically brand new, that is going very nearly half-price. I should not, of course, mention this just now, if I had not seen the half-yearly report of your Boot Company.

Yes, Dr. Julia Seton Sears is to add to the hebdomadal intellectuality of the metropolis by a "New Thought Campaign." I do not strongly advise the girls to come up and hear her. She is certain to settle in one Kensington or another to the accompaniment of mirrors, red plush, and contralto vocalism from behind a Japanese screen. She will probably wear garments—not dresses—of some soft clinging material. If, however, you do go to her you will look the part more if you are expensively dressed—put on the dress my father-in-law likes you most in—if your little bag is of chaste suède fitted with oxidised silver, and if you wear several gold bracelets outside your tightly buttoned kid gloves. The girls should not attempt anything artistic either with beads, low collars, or embroidered yokes, since Dr. Julia is not out to save the already saved. I mention all this, as I know your conscience bids you be intellectual at least once a week. I wish I could offer to put you up, but since James has taken to study, I feel he must be as quiet as possible.

You might tell my father-in-law about James and the aborigines—also about the Panhard.—Your loving daughter-in-law,

VERITY CARTERET-POTT.

THE SKILLED WOMAN WORKER.

Every day the demand for skilled work becomes more insistent. In looking over a paper on Architecture for Women, by Miss Clotilde Brewster, written some years ago, I find an admirable sentence: "Every day we see untrained ingenuity blossom into ephemeral horrors," and if that is true of the more intellectual branches of women's work it is even more true that in the lower branches every day we seen untrained labour go to the wall in favour of skill.

A good deal of the trouble which has arisen in many directions of women's work is due to the fact that when they first entered the labour market seriously they were to a great extent untrained, and had to accept what wages they could get. And as it is an accepted rule that prices are more ready to go up than down, and wages, although not very heavy, are far more apt to sink than to rise, it follows that women, when they became skilled, could not command prices in any way proportionately better.

We still hear of the ingenuous poor soul who, being faced with the necessity for earning her living, thinks that a fountain pen is the only requisite for the life of a secretary, and that her own half-forgotten schooling will equip her fully as a governess; whilst, as a matter of fact, the general tendency is so much in the opposite direction that even in that historic profession for distressed ladies, the difficult art of companionship, we shall soon be finding that old ladies with pet pugs will demand in their paid companions veterinary qualifications, a musical diploma, a certificate of proficiency in elocution, and an assurance that the applicant writes shorthand and has attended a complete course in first aid, home nursing, and domestic science. For we take our domesticity now very thoroughly, and scarcely dare to boil an egg without figuring out for ourselves abstruse calculations as to chemical reactions.

Meanwhile it seems to me admirable to see how clearly women are tabulating the conditions and prospects of women's work. That invaluable publication "The Englishwoman's Year Book" is a shining example of this tabulation, and a shilling edition has just been issued of Mr. Berry's "Professions for Girls," which gives elementary information as to how to set about entering a profession, institutes for training, and probable pay when trained. The innumerable facilities for training in every possible direction are in themselves evidence of the fact that there is no hope for the amateur wage-earner. We are perhaps in danger of swinging too much to the further side, and thinking too much of diplomas. One must remember that examination is not at all a fair test of a good many people's capacity. Some temperaments are completely paralysed by an examination.

But while striking proofs of the necessity of training workers are multiplying on every hand, it is amazing how many people still imagine that a woman can at five minutes' notice turn her attention to any profession she wishes to undertake, and after perhaps three months of preparation will be able to earn good money. Those days have passed for ever, with the advent of the specialised worker, and it cannot be too strongly pointed out to people whose daughters are growing up that training in some self-supporting direction is as important as the three R's. After all, there are very few people who can say quite definitely that their incomes are absolutely safe to continue for a given number of years, and that their daughters, even during their father's lifetime, let alone after his death, will be secured from any necessity to earn their own living. Thirty years ago or more a woman left stranded could usually get employment of some kind by becoming either a companion or a governess, but this is no longer the case. Fitness is required everywhere, and even the average equipment of a clerk, that is, typewriting and shorthand, will before long command nothing but the tiniest wage. As soon as trained workers come into the arena the whole average is forced up. Human intelligence has produced so many machines for our service in these days that we are becoming more and more desirous of intelligence in human beings to direct those machines for us. A sound training is a better inheritance than a small legacy. Even if a first-rate training costs a couple of hundred pounds, it is worth more to a girl than £25 a year after her father dies.

But in this last respect much still remains to be done. One may publish handbooks, but there remains the task of getting people to read them, and it seems to me that anyone with a love of her kind and some spare cash would be a public benefactor to the rising generation of Englishwomen if she would equip a Mission to Thoughtless Parents, having special regard to those living in small country towns, of the type which still produces daughters of Huxtable in discouraging numbers.

THE MAID-OF-ALL-WORK.

("Domestic service more nearly approaches slavery than any other occupation."—Miss Todd.)

Maid-of-all-work, ere we part,
Take away this wretched tart;
Let it in the oven rest
Till the fire has warmed its breast;
Here me tell you ere you go,
Do not cook my victuals so!

By the fish you could not fry,
By the cat that on the sly
Left his milk inside the dish,
And departed with the fish;
By these remnants of the roe,
Hebe, you are far too slow.

By the beef I could not taste,
Burned to cinders (such a waste!);
By the pudding's darkened tinge,
Telling that it's had a singe;
By the pastry's leaden dough,
You will drive me mad, I know!

By the dishes and the plates,
By the rusty, dusty grates;
By the broken pans and pots
(For you know you've broken lots),
By the cash for these you owe,
Hebe, you are quite de trop.

Maid-of-all-work, when you're gone,
And your tasks I start upon,
Shall I tour the morning shops?
Can I cook these mutton chops?
Can I sweep and clean up? No.
Hebe, you must never go!

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Thursday.—"Bags," said Virginia to me at breakfast this morning, "What about bags?"

My thoughts dwelt lovingly upon a pheasant we had devoured the previous night, and then again upon an excellent story told of a mere trifler by the way of women's affections. He was an idle and pure sentimentalist, and had been for a walking tour through England. He had captured the heart of one innkeeper's daughter, one nursery governess, one girl of seventeen, and a grass widow of thirty, and he had described these achievements in all guileless simplicity: "It was a good bag, wasn't it?"

And again Virginia murmured, "What about bags?" and I recalled my wandering wits to the consideration of the hand-portmanteau now our burden when we take our walks abroad or in town "The approved variety has a measurement of 12 ins. by 9 ins., and is made of soft patent leather with a narrow gold rim broken at inch intervals. It is further decorated with a single initial of gold wire set in a ring of gold, while it contains a looking-glass and powder-puff, a purse, and much empty and useless space to be filled to indiscretion with patterns of materials for dresses we are not going to buy.

"In your case," said I to Virginia, "of course, it will be crowded up with samples of casement cloth and cretonnes, and you might even find room for an odd piece of Indian matting, a special design of bed ticking which takes your errant fancy, and a few atrocities in tapestries."

Virginia protested: "Go on about bags, never mind my idiosyncrasies," and I went on about bags anyhow, for they are a great bore, and yet we cannot do without them.

"We have entirely discarded from the best place in our affections the gold bag, and in its place we recognise a platinum chain bag formed of infinitesimal links and inset with almost invisible diamonds and fringed with drop pearls, the frame being studded with diamonds and pearls. Definitely simpler is a bag of antelope of long, narrow shape, metal framed, and held at the top with silken cords and tassels. There is a suggestion of the old-fashioned reticule about this, and it is far more elegant than the monster of our early spring fancy. A watered silk or velvet bag set in a gold rim and held with a silken cord and tassel at the moment absorbs my best consideration, but if you choose leather you must be wiser, since a proverb is responsible for assuring you there is nothing like it. There is a thin sort of morocco eminently satisfactory when bound by a narrow gold rim fixed in inch sections. The Directoire bag is slim of figure and looks well made in tapestry or Oriental embroidery, framed in gold and silk tasselled, and the huge knapsack of jewelled brocade or tapestry now accompanies all the best evening frocks. The bead bag has been revived to death, but old specimens are still acceptable, although the modern imitations are so admirable that they have discounted the attractions of their predecessors. Do you want any more?" And then I discovered that Virginia was reading the paper in a most discourteous fashion, as if my words of wisdom were not worth columns of unreliable information on the itinerant necessities of that ill-used hero, King Manuel, who so successfully captured England with the sunny smile of his blameless youth.

Friday.—I had intended to go to the meeting of the Actresses' Franchise League, where the always interesting Lena Ashwell was in the chair, and pretty Lilian Braithwaite was hostess. But alas! for that road and its good intentions. Is the Franchise League a good intention? I dare not doubt. Nita again came up from the country. She is rapidly becoming like the Germans, who are always talking of the advantage of their cities and always living in ours. She wanted to go to Drury Lane and see "The Whip," could I give her a bed? and in return she would give me a seat in her box. She need not have made the stipulation, but still I love this melodrama, and laughed and laughed again at the humours in the Chamber of Horrors scene, and the marvels of the accident on the railway line, and George Barrett's summing-up the ingredients essential to connubial bliss as "comfort, carpet slippers, and common sense."

Robert came and snatched me away before the great race was greatly won, and he took me to the King's Hall, Holborn, to make two of the celebrated many who paid tribute there to Sarah Bernhardt. He evinced his usual soothing sympathy with my needs, promptly saving my life and some of my reason with hot tea and a sandwich. He has his advantages, being amongst the few masculine treasures who have always plenty of small change and can always find a waiter to attend to them.

The divine Sarah looked more wonderful and human than ever in a white dress glistening with diamonds and silver beneath a would-be-fugitive scarf of rare sable. The smile of conquest was in her eyes, the flowers of affection were in her arms, and she was a complete exponent of the whole art of elocution when, with illuminative expression and a sigh, she but spoke the golden word heureuse.

The Countess of Warwick, with leaves entwined in her hair, graciously officiated as hostess-in-chief, and all the lights of the histrionic world scintillated merrily around her, with Ellen Terry as the abiding star, draped in emerald-green veiled in diaphanous black. Sir Herbert Tree made us envious of his privileges and appreciative of his wit when he told of an all-night sitting with the heroine, who had talked with him in skipping English whilst he had replied in halting French. Lily Brayton, who was a gorgeously beautiful circumstance in cloth of gold and peacock-blue chiffon, was joyously welcomed from her Australian triumphs. Mary Moore's pretty face was framed in a white feather boa above a gown of soft grey traced with crystal bugles. Fay Davis wore her dimples in happy union with pink chiffon and roses. Gertrude Kingston bore the honours of "The Little Theatre" thick upon her Paquin gown of black trimmed with old lace, and she steadily refused to confide to me the author of "Lysistrata," by Aristophanes. Constance Collier was to be seen clinging wisely to a lovely new cloak of brown velvet decked with skunk, Margaret Halstan most well became a dream in nattier blue and tinsel embroidery, and Yvette Guilbert adorned a chiné mantle with dead-leaf silken fringes. Mme. Bernhardt enjoyed the typical 'busman's holiday in the presentation of a little play on the French Revolution; and when this was over we supped and gossiped to our bodies' and souls' content; and the inner circle found every one was charming and young, while the outer circle counted their years with inartistic accuracy. In the hall I met Ada Leverson, with round, pale hair and square, pale cloak. She writes of love's shadow, but looks as if she perpetually danced in love's sunlight; and I greeted Hermann Klein as a returned wanderer, and recognised that his attractive American wife, in a light embroidered chiffon with jewelled trellis head-dress, is expert in the cult of costume, even as Julius Price in the charm of feminity. He was talking to a most bewitching damsel in blue. Then Robert began to mutter about the dull necessity for his early morning rising and to make pathetic allusions to the sorrows of the up-waiting maid, and I was persuaded away before I had entirely grasped the details of an adjacent cloak made of an Indian shawl and some olive-green satin garnished to taste with sable, and well served by its elegant wearer.

Saturday.—I hated the London fashions this morning. The excessive tightness of the short tailor-made coat of our immediate wear is an outrage against good taste—I had almost written decency; it reveals aggressively those outlines which are best concealed, it leaves off at exactly the wrong inch, and the superlative workmanship of the English tailor accentuates its objectionable want of reticence. Only the narrowest figure can stand or sit in it with elegance, and yet the multitude seems pledged to its adoption. The narrow skirts contribute towards the drawbacks of these extremely tight coats, and in the mere interests of beauty I am wishing the autumn away and the snows of yester-year, or to-morrow year, or any year which will necessitate the more sheltering garments of fur. I walked at the back of several sinners to-day, and wondered how they did it and why they should, and deplored that so little individuality could be counted for righteousness to my fellows.

I lunched at the Savoy and ate some excellent American lobster, amongst a minority of good deeds thus labelled, and I followed it with the roast beef of old England and common red cabbage salad mixed greatly to my satisfaction. I have asked Diana if I may grow red cabbages in my window boxes instead of red geraniums. It would be a nice change, and a useful. And then I ate three coffee éclairs and two lemon ices as if a cure for corpulency did not threaten to be amongst the vital interests of my present existence.

I fell against Sydney in the courtyard, and he told me a story of a diplomatic representative who shall be nameless, who thus described King Edward's funeral: "It was a mighty tribute to a mighty monarch; I should have been the centre of all eyes and the most popular feature of the procession, if it had not been for a darned spaniel." This, though funny and characteristic, should be placed on the records of things which should not have been said.

Mrs. A.'s Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

Gentista.—Better than columns of printed description is the actual photograph of a garment. This admits of no exaggeration for good or ill. Write, therefore, for that "fullest information on the new furs" to the International Fur Store, 163, Regent Street, and tell them to send you the volume they have just issued; they will forward it for the attractive price of gratis. The pictures are all photographs, and every style of coat and wrap, muff and boa, is included. It is an artistic joy to turn the pages. Yes, I will do as you suggest next week.

Mrs. Grundy.—I think your sketch admirable, and could not be improved upon. Personally, I should like the long roll collar of brown velvet, and the serge of the very finest herringbone description. The braids and buttons should also be brown. A full-crowned brown velvet toque, with a brim of preasant's breast, would be nice, or a brown felt cloche, if you prefer it, would look well with a wreath of dahlias in many coloured satins. This latter they would make for you for 30s. at the Parisian Hat Co., 67, Knightsbridge. If you send them this description they would know exactly the satin dahlias to make. I advise purple, bronze, brown, and yellow. The extreme width for a walking skirt is two and a-half yards, but most of them are not two yards.

Gadfly.—Have olive-green ratine with a diagonal stripe, 10s. 6d. per yard, made in tunic shape, with the turn-down collar you admire and a skunk bordering to the tunic, netted silk buttons, and a belt of suède to match. White at the neck is becoming, but I think in this instance I should advise a piece of Oriental embroidery. I am afraid you will find a skunk collar rather unbecoming in that position, but you can try it, and if you do not like it replace it later on with one of Oriental embroidery on a velvet foundation.

Cup and Saucer.—I find charmeuse a far more convenient material than velvet or velveteen, for these stick to chairs and are cumbersome to some extent. Dull peacock blue is a most becoming colour and looks its best under the influence of embroideries of amethyst bugles and sapphires. I like your schemes altogether; the green one is delicious. The gold tissue turban might be fastened with a cabochon ornament of emeralds and gold, with pendant tassels, and could be edged with very narrow gold lace.

Victoria.—You really must not wear hats of either of those colours; I could not countenance it. If you are tired of black hats, then have brown ones. If you insist on those very bright shades you must introduce them either in flowers or in feathers. A brown felt hat might, for example, have a wreath of holly berries or mountain ash, and that would serve the red dress. As for the blue, I should have a darker blue felt encircled with a band of blue feathers either lopophore or from a peacock's breast. Moufflon would look equally well for the foundation for either of these, and they would make from my description at the Parisian Hat Co., 67, Knightsbridge.

CONVENTION IN THE KITCHEN.

It is an odd thing that the most intelligent women are frequently so unreceptive of new ideas affecting their homes. How otherwise could it happen that in most English households arrangements once made are as the laws of the Medes and Persians, and conservatism reigns supreme? One would think the furniture was glued to the floor by the way in which it remains year after year in exactly the same spot. People have meals at the same hour, of the same food, and sitting in the same chair, as though there were some stringent law against any alteration, and as for new inventions and new ideas, an enormous number of the admirable devices for labour-saving put on the market fail to achieve any steady sale, and presently their promoters go bankrupt, and there is an end of them.

Someone said the other day that English cooking was not an art but a national vice. This horrible reputation is partly earned by the way in which we set our faces against any enlarging of our culinary borders. The nutritious pudding powders, custard powders, preserved fruits and vegetables to be had in every shop seem to fill the English housewife with distrust, and even when she has tried them at the house of a friend, and has been surprised and pleased with their delicious flavour, the variety they afford the menu, and the saving of trouble in the preparation of them, she goes back to the same old dishes in her own home.

Domestic life in England has settled into a sort of crystallisation which it seems hopeless to alter. A certain amount of flexibility in a housewife leads to all sorts of pleasant results. Life does not get monotonous under her rule. She is always ready for something new, and is in many ways a discreet experimentalist. She does not fall either into the error of giving toujours perdrix, or, on the other hand, always beef and beer. If variety is the very spice of life, it seems a pity that it is so often served unspiced.

So far as cookery goes, the British husband is partly responsible for the "everydayness of this workday world." He has a way of looking askance on any new dish that appears on his table, regarding it with diffidence amounting to suspicion. Although he is quite happy to eat a French dinner at a hotel or restaurant, at home he likes to see exactly what he is eating; and this is an idea fundamentally opposed to the spirit of French cookery. English tables abound in reminiscences of animals and live fish; we seem to take every opportunity of recalling to our minds the fact that we are eating calf or cow, or lamb or pig. There is something rather barbarous about it; but certainly the rise of restaurant life has done something towards softening down the rugged outlines of the English bill of fare.

In connection with the London County Council school for the training of boys as cooks, Dr. Josiah Oldfield strongly protests against any sort of cookery being taught to English boys save that based on the roast beef and plum pudding of tradition. He denies that there is any difference between chicken en casserole and stewed chicken, and says "the chicken can be stewed to meet English tastes." So it can, by introducing to it the ameliorations in vogue on the other side of the Channel. In the recipes given below, who could be harsh enough to call Poulet à la Princesse stewed chicken, and if they did, how would they differentiate it from other works of art built up on the basis of putting pieces of chicken into a pan of liquid and letting it cook? Dr. Oldfield does not realise that France has as much right to claim her own dishes as a man has to sign his own pictures, and that we have as much right to enjoy them as we have to like a visit to the National Gallery, where almost certainly our highest admiration will be called forth by some work not by an Englishman.

Dr. Oldfield also objects to menus being written in French. There are a good many difficulties in the way of translating them. Ris de veau à la Financière is all very well, but who is going to be tempted by "Smile of a calf at the financier's wife"? There is nothing in the following recipes, I maintain, which is too "kickshawish" for English tastes, and although the pudding might certainly have been called "Victoria Pudding" without hurting it, yet the chicken dish could not be described without a whole series of English landmarks comparable to the Menagère and Mornay and Toulouse of France, while as for "Blown Lemon," I for one should certainly miss tasting a very delicious dish if it were presented to me under such a very unappetising title.

Poulet a la Princesse.—Cut a plump chicken into neat pieces, season them with salt and pepper, and sautez them with 2 ozs. of butter in a sautépan. Meanwhile, remove the skin and gills from 1 lb. of fresh mushrooms and chop them, sprinkling them with lemon juice to preserve their colour. Cook the mushrooms in a covered stewpan with 1 oz. of butter, a little lemon juice, and salt and pepper to season; add the pieces of chicken, and moisten with a gill of chicken or veal stock, simmer for half an hour, then mix in the yolks of two eggs previously beaten with a gill of cream. Dish the chicken on a croûte of fried bread, placing the inferior parts at the bottom, and garnish it with a border made in this way:—Cut small red tomatoes across in halves—they should not be over-ripe—scoop out the seeds, and fill them alternately with boiled green peas and dice-shaped pieces of cooked cucumber; sprinkle the cucumber with chopped parsley and the peas with passed hard-boiled yolk of egg.

Pouding à la Victoria.—Butter a plain mould, and tie a greased paper, 2 ins. higher than the mould, round the outside. Dissolve 1 oz. of butter in a stewpan, mix in 1 oz. of flour, 1 oz. of pounded sugar, and a gill of milk; stir it until quite boiling, when it should be a stiffish paste; take from the fire, and work in the yolks of three eggs, each one separately, a little essence of vanilla, and, lastly, the stiffly whipped whites of the eggs must be carefully mixed, not to destroy the lightness of the pudding Steam it three-quarters of an hour in the prepared mould with a greased paper over it, and serve it with almond sauce poured round. The almond sauce can be made in this way:—Blanch, skin, and pound a dozen sweet with two bitter almonds, adding ½ oz. of sugar and a spoonful of orange flower water to prevent them oiling; put them into a small stewpan with a gill of milk, 1 oz. of sugar, and the yolks of two eggs; whisk the sauce on the stove till it is quite thick, but not boiling. Whisk it for a minute on removing it from the fire to prevent it curdling.

Lemon Soufflé.—Rub the peel of a lemon on 4 ozs. of loaf sugar and pound it absolutely fine, whip it in a basin with the yolks of four eggs until very light (it will take from ten to fifteen minutes), then lightly mix it in the stiffly whipped whites of three eggs, and bake it seven minutes in a moderate oven, using a silver soufflé dish if possible.

DECEIVED BY DIABOLUS!

The well-known proverb should read: "God sends the Food, but the Devil sends the Saucepans," which boil and wash out the valuable salts, tonics, natural aperients, and life-giving essences of meat and vegetables, which are designed to revitalise and re-invigorate body and brain. On account of this "washed out" method of cookery, many suffer from "Brain Fag," Dyspepsia, Insomnia, Neuralgia, and Anæmia, seeking relief in drugs, stimulants, narcotics, and quack nostrums, in a vain attempt to make up for that which, in folly, has been thrown away. But the evil has been overcome at last by the aid of a Simple, Scientific, and Conservative Cooker, which conserves all the vital essences of Meat and Vegetables. This Cooker is called—

WELBANK'S BOILERETTE

THIS WONDER-WORKING INVENTION

Gets intensely hot, above 212 degrees, yet never burns the food. As it is Self-Acting, it requires no attention, and can be left for hours to "look after itself."

"THE IDEAL COOKER" (Hospital).

The Ideal Cooker for Porridge, Milk, Milk Foods, Soups, Stews, Jellies, Custards, Sauces, Jam and Marmalade Making, Beef Tea, &c. A Speciality for Invalid and Vegetarian Cookery.

COOKS MEAT & VEGETABLES IN OWN JUICES

By which means all the valuable Salts, Tonics, Natural Aperients, and Life-Giving Properties of Meat and Vegetables, which are usually washed away, are fully conserved.

BEAUTIFUL BOILERETTED BEEF.

Better than Roast. The boilerette browns meat. Fat eats like marrow. Lean so tender that it can be spread like potted meat, yet so thin that it can be thinly sliced.
Very delicious as a cold joint

"THE OLD CONVERTED INTO YOUNG."

The Boilerette will make Tough Meat tender and digestible, and Old and Cheap Fowls more tender and delicious than expensive Chickens cooked in the ordinary way.

THE COOKER THAT LOOKS AFTER ITSELF.

You simply put a complete dinner in the Boilerette, go right away and leave it to take care of itself. When you are ready to dine, it will be found beautifully cooked, ready to serve.
Please Note.—These Boilerettes can be left for hours without attention.

THE GOLDEN SILENCE
By C. N. & A. M. WILLIAMSON

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Stephen Knight, the hero of "The Golden Silence," has quixotically allowed himself to be entangled in an engagement with a girl he does not really love. They separate for awhile, she going to Canada, he to visit a friend in Algiers. On the boat Knight meets an extraordinary American girl with whose fate his own becomes allied. She is in search of a lost sister; Knight wants to help her; but she falls into the power of a handsome Arab, with whom she disappears. Knight traces the girl into the Sahara, and there are many vivid pictures of Arab life and many exciting adventures leading to an unconventional dénouement.

BABES IN THE WOOD
By B. M. CROKER

Crown 8vo, 6s.

The scene of this novel is laid in India, in the heart of the Central Provinces. The principal character is a young Forest Officer, who is learning experience of the natives, the jungle, and the Anglo-Indian community. He is stationed in an isolated district, where the few Europeans who are associated with one another are supposed by the outer world to lead the simple, sylvan life, and are nicknamed "The Babes in the Wood."

THE MISSING DELORA
By E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM

Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Mr. Oppenheim is the king of mystery writers, and the tangles and intrigues of "The Missing Delora" will be found to surpass even those of "The Illustrious Prince"—the highly successful novel by the same writer published this spring. The book opens in Paris, in the extraordinary Café des Deux Epingles, the haunt of the highest-class villain. Here Captain Rotherby, who has been introduced to the place by Louis, the remarkable maitre d'hotel of the Milan Hotel in London, falls under the spell of one of the most attractive heroines in modern fiction.

AN AMAZING RECORD.

MILLS & BOON have great pleasure in announcing the remarkable success of

Sir Claude Champion de Crespigny's

FORTY YEARS OF A SPORTSMAN'S LIFE.

10s. 6d. net.,

which is the best reviewed SPORTING BOOK OF THE CENTURY.

Every organ of note has been unanimous in its criticism that no finer Sporting Volume has been published of recent years, each expressing wonder and surprise at its author's amazing adventures, also giving the book enthusiastic praise for its bracing tone and enthralling interest. The demand is extraordinary, the First Edition is exhausted, a Second Edition is rapidly selling, and a Third Edition is in the press.

"As one reads on one can almost imagine the great sportsman is sitting opposite one and just telling story after story of his adventurous career as they occur to his memory. . . . From cover to cover there is not a dull page in the whole book, which will be welcomed by every man all the world over."—DAILY MAIL.

"Racy and delightful memoirs. Distinctly one of the books of the season. There is a love of sport for sport's sake, a dare-devil recklessness, a sublime disregard of consequences, which places him on a level with such facinating heroes of romance as D'Artagean or Barry Lyndon."—EAST ANGLIAN TIMES.

"Amazing or nothing is the record contained in these three hundred pages. Towards the close the author is troubled with a qualm that he may be censured as a boaster. But there is nothing boastful in the book. Now and again, indeed, a sedentary reader is left a little breathless; but this is a tribute to the uncommonness of the adventure, not to the braggart disposition of the adventurer. Between Sir Claude and Munchausen, in a word, there is no suspicion of kinship."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"More enthralling than the most romantic novel."—SPORTING LIFE.

"We shall look to another instalment of these memoirs, which are as bracing as a north-east wind."—EVENING STANDARD.

"This entertaining volume will prove one of the most successful sporting books of the year."—SPORTING TIMES.

YVETTE GUILBERT: STRUGGLES AND VICTORIES.

By Yvette Guilbert and Harold Simpson.

Profusely Illustrated with Caricatures, Portraits, Facsimiles of Letters, &c.
Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Daily Chronicle.—"'To God first of all.' It is the dedication of a book. And the writer of it adds, 'Pour satisfier ma foi et ma conscience il me faut d'abord et avant toute chose remercier Dieu . . . ma destinée fut Son ouvrage, mes luttes me furent utiles pour apprécier mieux mes victoires.' It is not the dedication of the memories of an ecclesiastic. It is the singing note of a little street girl who came from the gutter to fame, who knew Paris from i s seamy side, knew it so well that she sang its songs—that rather 'shocked' London with 'La Soularde' in the nineties, and has come through the least religious capital in the world with the sure belief in God. Yvette Guilbert's book is fascinating. As a mere book it is remarkable, because for the half of it you may read Yvette's own French, and the translation of Mr. Simpson on the opposite page."

Daily Telegraph.—"Madame Yvette Guilbert begins her autobiographical sketch with a dedication to God—'A Dieu d'abord,' as she puts it—and, less laconic than Voltaire, she puts forth her reasons for so doing in a beautifully written letter here reproduced in facsimile. Many English and French readers will no doubt be somewhat surprised at so gushing a testimonial from the delicious artist whose reticence and discretion have always been no small factors in her peculiar succe s, though we cannot but highly commend the proper feeling and excellent sentiments which prompt the letter. The volume itself is a real delight all through. Yvette Guilbert is an artist second to none, a star shedding her own particular light which none has emulated, far less eclipsed, and the publishers have had the admirable idea of giving us her own words on the one page with a translation on the other."

MY GERMAN YEAR.

By I. A. R. Wylie.

Author of "The Rajah's People." (Second Edition in the press.)
With 2 Illustrations in Colour and 18 from Photographs.
Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The Westminster Gazette has reviewed "My German Year" as a "vivid attractive, and really informing volume," and "wise, well-informed, and very readable, with some delightful fresh information and shrewd criticism." Also saying:

"We close 'My German Year' with a feeling of gratitude for very good entertainment all through, and with a sense that though on a good many minor points the writer is led by her enthusiasm to see matters in a far too roseate light, she has used her brain and her eyes to good purpose during her 'German Year,' and has written a book which suffers in no way by the fact that the last few years have seen the publication in this country of several volumes on the same subject."

The Evening Standard (a lengthy notice) said:—"We have seldom read a more interesting book than 'My German Year.' Miss Wylie's words are often bitter to the taste, still more bitter very often is what she leaves unsaid, the obvious inferences she hands on to us to draw, but it is all extremely salutary, and should be read by every householder in the land."

"There is no way of telling whether this is one of the many 'first novels' that Messrs. Mills & Boon have introduced to the public. If it is, it is one in which to feel much hope. The book has quality, and treats a limited subject with a largeness of outlook and a lack of the catchpenny emotions that give it distinction. The whole thing is more suggestion than fact. But it is a large suggestion. It rouses. It interests. It touches the imagination."—Daily News.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

The Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring the Middlesex Music Hall and the Mogul Tavern, Drury Lane, Nos. 166, 170, 171, and 173, Drury Lane, and No. 1, Shelton Street, London, and to rebuild, equip, and carry on the Middlesex Theatre of Varieties as a place of popular entertainment, and also to rebuild the Mogul Tavern.

The Middlesex Theatre of Varieties is fully licensed.

The site upon which the Middlesex Theatre of Varieties and the other properties above mentioned stand is freehold, and is situated in a convenient position on the North East side of Drury Lane, about 300 yards from the Drury Lane Theatre and Covent Garden Opera House.

The properties occupy an important and compact site, having an area (exclusive of No. 173, Drury Lane) of about 12,655 square feet with frontages of about 105 feet to Drury Lane and 154 feet to Shelton Street.

Mr. Isaac Nathaniel Lyons has purchased the whole of the properties (subject to a mortgage for £22,000 with interest at 6 per cent. per annum) at the price of £5,500, and will transfer such properties to the Company at the same price as that at which he has acquired them plus the other payments actually made by him in connection with the purchase, but without profit to himself in consideration of the right to apply for and be allotted to himself or his nominees 300 of the deferred shares at par. The Company will out of the proceeds of the present issue discharge the said mortgage.

Plans have been prepared by the well-known Architects, Messrs. Frank Matcham and Co., for the re-building of the Theatre and Mogul Tavern and such plans have been approved by the London County Council and the Licensing Justices for the Division in which the property is situated.

It is estimated by Mr. Stoll that the expense of conducting entertainments on the lines now intended will approximate to £24,000 per annum, leaving a probable minimum profit of about £10,000 per annum available for payment of interest upon the Debenture stock, Directors' Fees, Redemption of Debenture Stock, and Dividends on Capital.

Mr. Stoll is the Managing Director of the following Companies:—

Moss Empires, Limited, which paid a dividend of 5 per cent. per annum last year and has paid an average dividend of 9 per cent. over the last 9 years.

Coliseum Syndicate, Limited, which paid a dividend of 15 per cent. for 1908, 20 per cent. for 1909, and an interim dividend of 20 per cent. per annum for the first half of 1910.

Hackney and Shepherd's Bush Empire Palaces, Limited, which has paid an average dividend of more than 14 per cent. over the last 8 years.

Manchester Hippodrome and Ardwick Empire, Limited, which has paid an average dividend of 10 per cent. over the last 5 years.

Leicester Palace Theatre, Limited, which paid a dividend of 7½ per cent. last year and has paid an average dividend of more than 7 per cent. over the last 9 years.

In addition to the profits which may be anticipated from the working of the theatre the Company will, in the opinion of the Directors, derive a substantial income from the Mogul Tavern, which is fully licensed and will be re-built on modern lines. This property and No. 173, Drury Lane may be estimated to produce £1,000 per annum.

The Minimum Subscription on which the Directors may proceed to allotment is fixed by the Articles of Association at 10 per cent. of the amount offered but as 45,000 of the Ordinary Shares now being offered for subscription have been underwritten the Directors will proceed to allotment upon the closing of the lists.

Application should be made on the form accompanying the full Prospectus, which can be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers and Solicitors, and from the Registered Office of the Company, and forwarded to the Bankers of the Company with the amount payable on application.

SHORT NOTICE.

A copy of the full Prospectus has been filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies. The SUBSCRIPTION LIST WILL OPEN on MONDAY, the 10th day of October, 1910, and will CLOSE on OR BEFORE Wednesday, the 12th day of October, 1910.

This Company has been formed to acquire the group of gold mining claims, situated in the well-known mining district of Jicaro, Department of Nueva Segovia, Republic of Nicaragua, Central America.

THE MINING RIGHTS AND MILL SITE.

The following is a list of the mining rights:—

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| San Cristobal, Aguja de Arra | (held under one title) | 400 × 200 Varas200 × 200 „ |
| La Tranquilidad | | 400 × 200 „ |
| El Tirado (including Socorro) | | 600 × 125 „ |
| Santa Ana | | 600 × 200 „ |
| San Pablo | | 600 × 200 „ |
| El Golpe | | 600 × 170 „ |
| La Concepcion | | 700 × 200 „ |
| San Lorenzo | | 200 × 200 „ |

The said mining rights together constitute 21½ claims, and in area approximate to 139 acres.

The Mill Site, known as Pilar de la Virgen, acquired for water and power purposes, has an area of 1,000,000 square varas (about 175 acres) with frontage of some 2,700 feet to the River Jicaro.

An exhaustive report on the property, with plans, including assay plan, has been made by Mr. E. W. J. Edwards, Assoc.M.I.C.E., Assoc.R.C.Sc., Lond., who, having had charge of and superintended most of the recent development work, on behalf of Mr. John May, the agent in Nicaragua above mentioned, has the advantage of an intimate knowledge of the property.

THE ORE BODIES.

The auriferous lodes are of considerable size; they outcrop on the mountains to an elevation of 500 feet above the river, and can be cheaply worked for some time to come by means of tunnels. There are at least three distinct main lines of lode, namely the San Cristobal, the Aguja de Arra and Santa Ana (probably the same), and the Tirado and Socorro (probably the same), and all the lines have been proved to carry payable gold. The ores carry fine gold well distributed, and by the ordinary amalgamation method, with subsequent cyanide treatment, over 80 per cent. of the total value is recoverable.

ESTIMATED PROFIT ON FIRST YEAR'S WORKING OF MILLING PLANT.

The Engineer's Report shows that the San Cristobal ore has an average value of at least £5 per ton from the ore at present exposed and that after making an allowance of 10% for loss in treatment and 16s. per ton for expenses a net profit will remain of £3 14s. a ton, showing on the working of a plant of 25 tons per day capacity for 300 days in the year a net profit of £27,750.

The Directors, however, prefer to estimate on a conservative basis and therefore make a further deduction of 10%, and on these figures the following results should be obtained on the first year's working:—

|---|---|
| Treatment of 25 tons per day for 300 days, or 7,500 tons at £3 4s. per ton net profit | £24,000 |
| To pay 20 per cent. on the nominal capital of £75,000 | £15,000 |
| Leaving a balance available for Reserve, further Distribution of Dividends, etc., of | £9,000 |

Prospectuses and forms of application can be obtained from the Company's Bankers, Brokers, and Solicitors, and at the offices of the Company.

Dated this 30th day of September, 1910.

"TRUTH" DOLL AND TOY SHOW.

PRELIMINARY NOTICE.

It seems early days yet to be reminding my readers of an event which is still some months ahead. But the fact that a large number of dolls are still crying aloud for clothes, impels me to direct the attention of TRUTH'S lady friends to their condition, and to the fact that they will be required for exhibition at the Albert Hall in the middle of December, prior to distribution among the London Poor Law Schools and Hospitals.

I hope that many ladies will take pity on the poor dolls, and forward their applications as soon as possible. The usual prizes for the dressing of the dolls will, of course, be awarded after the Show.

HOME-MADE TOYS.

The exhibits in this class last year did not come up to expectations. This year special efforts will be made to stimulate amateur toy-makers to take part in the Competition. With that object in view the Editor of TRUTH has decided (assuming the entries warrant it) to give a Special Prize for

HOME-MADE DOLLS' HOUSES,

in addition to the usual Prizes offered in the Home-Made Toys Class.

He desires me now to direct particular notice to this, as he is of opinion that the making of Dolls' Houses is an art in which amateur talent is likely to find congenial scope for its exercise. Moreover, a Dolls' House is a peculiarly serviceable sort of plaything for children, both because it is one in the delights of which several can share simultaneously, and also because it is better able to withstand the wear and tear of daily use than smaller and more fragile toys.

A further and more detailed announcement of the Show will appear in due course. Meanwhile, let readers of TRUTH make a careful note of the date, which is Wednesday and Thursday, December 14 and 15, 1910.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best EPIGRAM, CONUNDRUM, LIPOGRAM, BOUTS-RIMÉS, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a quarter to the same competitor.

7. ALL NEW CONTRIBUTORS ARE REQUIRED TO FORWARD WITH THEIR FIRST ANSWERS THEIR REAL NAMES AND ADDRESSES FOR REGISTRATION; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed twelve, and must under no circumstances consist of more than fourteen, letters.

9. COMPETITORS MUST ON NO ACCOUNT CHANGE THE NOMS-DE-PLUME THEY HAVE ONCE ASSUMED.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed:—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," CARTERET STREET, QUEEN ANNE'S GATE, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,652.

I happened to be discussing with a friend, a week or two ago, the pros and cons of the Censor's action in putting a veto on Mr. Laurence Housman's latest play because it contained certain references to George IV. My friend contended—and, I think, with reason—that if Thackeray, who lived and wrote half a century nearer that monarch's time than we do, could be permitted to publish his famous lecture on the "First Gentleman in Europe" without interference, it is absurd, at this time of day, to rule out Mr. Housman's apparently much less uncomplimentary references, merely because they are meant to be pronounced on the stage and not in the lecture-room.

My friend also went on to contend—with perhaps less reason—that under any circumstances it was impossible to libel George IV. Herein I dissented from him, maintaining that the monarch was by no means so bad as Thackeray had painted him. A warm discussion followed, which gradually enlarged itself into a general review of the undesirable monarchs who have, at one time or another, sat on the English throne.

In the end we arrived at no particular conclusion. But the discussion set me thinking that here was rather good matter for one of TRUTH'S weekly competitions.

I am therefore offering the usual prize of Two Guineas this week to that competitor who shall prove most successful in NAMING, IN ORDER OF DEMERIT, THE THREE WORST SOVEREIGNS (KINGS OR QUEENS) WHO HAVE SAT ON THE ENGLISH THRONE FROM (AND INCLUDING) WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR DOWN TO (AND INCLUDING) THE MUCH-ABUSED GEORGE IV.

The Prize award will be made on a plébiscite basis.

No competitor may submit more than one list of three worst Sovereigns; and all lists must reach TRUTH Office not later than by the first post on Monday, October 24.

WHAT THE MIDLAND FURNISHING CO. CLAIM FOR THEMSELVES.

At one time and another grave accusations have been made against the hire furnishing business. There is no need to enter into a discussion as to the general truth of the statement. There may be such firms. But undoubtedly there are others doing a large business on lines to which no exception can be taken; firms that conduct and always have conducted business on a straightforward basis. Because some firms take advantage of their customers, either by the poor quality of their goods, or by their extremely high prices, it does not follow that all firms are tarred with the same brush.

There is one firm in particular who do, and have always done, a straightforward business. Their prices are moderate and the quality of the furniture that they supply is good. For the value they give, you have only to compare their prices with those of other houses, which will show greatly to their advantage. The reference is to the Midland Furnishing Co., Limited, of Southampton Row, Holborn, W.C. It is the oldest established house in London selling furniture on the gradual payment system, and it is doing a business probably as great as that of any other two houses in the trade.

Now everybody will realise that firms do not do an immense business unless there is some cause for it. What, then, is the cause of the Midland Furnishing Company's tremendous turnover? Value. For every twenty shillings spent with them you get twenty shillings' worth. Value and fair treatment are enough to satisfy the most exacting customer. More it is not possible to give. The methods of the company which does business on these lines will naturally be of interest to everybody.

The three great qualities that the Midland Furnishing Company always claim for their goods are the following:—First-class design, A1 manufacture, and moderation in cost. What more could the purchaser want? The stock that the company keep is wonderful, anything that the most fastidious purchaser could possibly desire is there. Only one class they do not keep, and that is rubbish. Every article they sell is fair value. It is well known that the goods sold by many firms on the gradual-payment system would not bear a very careful examination, and unhappily these firms are so well protected by the law of libel that it is impossible to give the names of the culprits. However, the customer who deals with the Midland Furnishing Co., Limited, can rest quite satisfied that he or she will be receiving fair value for anything that they spend, whether the amount is large or small.

Take, for example, the specimen model flats and rooms. The flats are shown—completely fitted and furnished—at the following prices:—£50, £100, £250, £500, and £1,000. They are marvels of taste and cheapness. The furnishing and decoration are carried out with rare judgment, and the prices are arranged to suit all purses. The model specimen rooms are the same patterns of elegance. They are shown complete at all prices from £10 to £300. Don't think that the "Midland" shows only flats and rooms, as, large as the space is that these take up in the firm's showrooms, it is only a small spot compared with their huge floor-space. Here you will see everything that is new in furnishing; suites made by themselves or bought from the very best cabinet makers in the country, upholstered goods—all of this class being the firm's own manufacture—sideboards, cabinets, carpets, and the thousand and one articles that only a firm of their great resources could possibly stock.

Everything is marked at a price that will bear comparison with those of any other firm, and don't forget that all prices are shown in plain figures.

Without boasting, the Midland Furnishing Company claim that they have the finest selection of genuine second-hand furniture in the country, marked at prices that are positively astonishing. They have men out all over the country constantly buying for them. As well as second-hand goods, they place, in the same department, all goods that have become slightly stock-soiled. These are also reduced to the same wonderfully low scale. They issue a special booklet of all these goods that will well repay an intending purchaser to send for. It is surprising what money can be saved if the buyer knows where to place his order.

Now a few words about the firm's system of business, and under what terms they do their immense turnover.

Every article that they sell can be obtained on their well-known gradual payment system, without any extra charge whatsoever for credit. The purchaser selects his goods, from the plain tickets remember, and then, as he requests, the payments are extended over one, two, or three years, without one halfpenny interest or any extra charge whatsoever being added. No deposit is required. Should the customer prefer to pay cash he is allowed a discount of 5 per cent. The firm pay the fare to town of a customer who lives in the country, providing that he spends the sum of £30 with them, cash or credit. All goods in the country are packed free and carriage paid, and in the suburban area the firm deliver free in their own plain vans. Carpets and linos are planned and laid free.

The firm issue a beautiful catalogue, which is sent post free upon application. If you really want to furnish well and cheaply you cannot do better than write to them for a copy, or, better still, if you live in town, call in at their showrooms, Nos. 15, 17, 19, 21, 23, Southampton Row, Holborn, W.C.

QUEER STORIES

3rd Edition] FROM "TRUTH." [3rd Edition.

The Justice of this Criticism is fully borne out by the following Extracts from Reviews of this Latest Volume:

SCOTSMAN.—"Have long enjoyed well-deserved favour."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"A selection from this well known and deservedly popular feature in our popular contemporary. All its stories are wide awake."

REFEREE.—"It contains thirty stories, all of which are interesting, and some of which are very good indeed."

THE JEWISH WORLD.—"A splendid exchange for a shilling."

WESTERN DAILY PRESS.—"Very engrossing. They are 'queer' stories in that practically every one ends in an unexpected way, and contains a good surprise."

BAZAAR.—"This latest series should have as large a circulation as those which have preceded it."

SPORTSMAN.—"We need not commend them; they are well known to be entertaining."

ULSTER GUARDIAN.—"There are no short stories to compare with those which appear weekly in TRUTH, and we cannot think of a better shillingsworth of holiday fiction than one of the volumes. . . . which contain thirty of the brightest and best of these famous stories."

SUSSEX DAILY NEWS.—"A brilliant shillingsworth. Practically every one of the thirty stories it contains is of much more than ordinary interest. They are of that happy magnetism which compels the reading of the whole story once the first page has been scanned."

WORCESTER HERALD.—"Brighter reading for the railway carriage or the odd half-hour anywhere cannot be found."

THE NORTHERN WHIG.—"244 pages of true enjoyment."

CORK EXAMINER.—"Extraordinary value for the modest sum charged for the book."

NOTTINGHAM GUARDIAN.—"Comes opportunely to serve for holiday and seaside reading."

SPORTING LIFE.—"Better holiday fare it would be difficult to find. The stories are, needless to say, varied and bright, and form an exceptionally good shillingsworth."

FINANCIAL TIMES.—"May be recommended to those who are taking their holidays."

HOSPITAL.—"We strongly recommend this excellent shillingsworth."

FINANCIER.—"Well up to the level of excellence established by the first volume of this always entertaining series."

ENTRE NOUS.

THE King and Queen will leave St. Pancras early to-morrow afternoon for Lynn, accompanied by Princess Mary. The Royal train is to arrive at Lynn at three o'clock, and their Majesties will drive from the station to the Corn Exchange, where an address from the Corporation is to be presented. The King and Queen will afterwards drive to Sandringham, and they are expected to stay at York Cottage for about ten days. The King has much estate business to transact. His Majesty will shoot over some of the outlying preserves, and over those preserves which he rents from Sir William Ffolkes, of Hillington Hall. Partridges are very scarce indeed in the eastern counties, and the King intends to shoot them very lightly.

A paragraph has gone round the papers which states that the King has been so occupied at Balmoral with State affairs that their Majesties have made hardly any visits in company to their neighbours on Deeside, as King Edward and Queen Alexandra used to do. This is most absolute rubbish. King Edward and Queen Alexandra were never at Balmoral together except for a short time in September, 1902, when his late Majesty was recovering from the illness which seized him just before the day fixed for the Coronation. During the next seven years Queen Alexandra spent ten days at Balmoral after the Cowes Regatta week, and King Edward was at the Castle for between two and three weeks considerably later on in the autumn. Everything has gone on at Balmoral during the last two months with the customary routine of the Court when staying in Scotland. The guests at the Castle have been official personages only with two or three exceptions. There has been no change whatever in the shooting arrangements, everything having gone on as in past years.

The papers have referred constantly to the King's grouse drives, but his Majesty has only been out on the moors for three days altogether, and the bags obtained were moderate. There are very few grouse on the various Royal estates, as the deer forests have always been the main object. It is probable that in future years King George will shoot in England at the opening of the season. This year their Majesties went to Balmoral at the beginning of August, as they were in need of rest and change, and it was thought that the bracing air of Upper Deeside would be very beneficial, especially to King George. Next year the residence of the Court at Balmoral is not likely to begin until nearly the end of August.

---

His Majesty will continue the arrangement made by King Edward about a year ago for the loan of drawings from the Royal collection at Windsor Castle to the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge. The examples lent for the present term have just been sent to Cambridge, and they are by Holbein, Van Dyck, Dürer, Hollar, and Van der Neer. The collection of drawings at Windsor Castle is one of the finest in England. The Duke of Devonshire has consented to lend six drawings of old masters each term from the rare and splendid collection at Chatsworth. The present duke's grandfather was Chancellor of the University for nearly thirty years, and the late duke succeeded his father in that office.

---

The King held a Diplomatic Court at Marlborough House on Friday morning, when the new Greek Minister and the new Minister from Hayti presented their letters of credence. Sir Arthur Nicholson and the members of the Household-in-Waiting were in attendance, and Levee dress was worn.

Queen Alexandra has finally decided not to visit Norway this year, but Princess Victoria is leaving Copenhagen this week for Christiania, and she will be the guest of King Haakon and Queen Maud until she returns to England.

Some of the papers are foolishly endeavouring to raise an elaborate fuss about King Manuel's arrival in England. His Majesty and Queen Amélie are expected at Wood Norton, where they will pass the winter, and there can be no idea of their making any public appearances. Some nonsense has appeared concerning the ex-King's "place at Court," the fact being that he can have no "place" whatever, nor is he likely to be seen "at Court" on any public occasion. King George may grant King Manuel whatever precedence he may be entitled to as a distant cousin, the ex-King being a great-great-grand-nephew of the Duchess of Kent, whose nephew, the King Consort Ferdinand of Portugal, was a first cousin of Queen Victoria and Prince Albert. Ferdinand would have inherited the great Kohary estates in Hungary but for his having renounced his succession to this vast property when he married the Queen of Portugal in 1836, and his next brother became the heir.

King Manuel and Queen Amélie were anxious to proceed from Gibraltar to Cadiz, in order that they might reside for some time at Villamanrique, the seat of the Comtesse de Paris, where she spends the winter and spring months. This plan was abandoned in consequence of the objections raised by the Spanish Government.

It has been stated, on the authority of "one of the King's attendants," that he has no money, his possessions consisting only of land in Portugal. Queen Amélie, however, has a large fortune of her own, amounting to nearly twelve millions of francs, but it is scarcely conceivable that the King made no provision for himself abroad, inasmuch as a revolution has been constantly expected ever since his reign commenced.

Exiled Royalties invariably proclaim themselves to be without adequate means. This was the tale when Louis Philippe fled to England in 1848, and how many times has it been stated that Louis Napoleon had no fortune put away out of France. This audacious fiction is still to be heard, but if he had not made large provision for a crash how was he able to live in luxury during the last two years of his life, and how is the large expenditure of the Empress Eugénie to be accounted for. The fact is that if an exiled sovereign is known to be rich he is for ever being pestered for assistance by a horde of followers and by beguiling rogues who have devised plausible plans for a restoration if only plenty of money is forthcoming in advance.

The Comtesse de Paris is expected to arrive in England shortly from France, and she will join the family party at Wood Norton for a week or two before going to Spain for the winter. It is probable that the Duc and Duchesse de Chartres will also come over to Wood Norton for a few days, in order that a full family council may be held for the consideration of the position of Queen Amélie and King Manuel, and to discuss their plans for the future.

The King and Queen of Denmark have left the Castle of Charlottenlund after a residence of four months, and they will spend the next few weeks at Fredensborg, the Royal domain on Lake Esröm. This picturesque château is surrounded by extensive beech forests, in which the Emperor Alexander II. liked to hunt by moonlight. King Christian and Queen Louise for many years received a large family party at Fredensborg every autumn, but these gatherings were discontinued after the death of the late Tsar in 1894. The Empress Marie and Queen Alexandra are expected at Fredensborg on a strictly private visit.

Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein, who is now with Princess Christian at Cumberland Lodge, was last week on a visit to Lord and Lady Emlyn at Frensham Hall. Princess Victoria has been spending a few weeks in Germany, during which she was the guest of the Emperor and Empress of Russia, of the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Hesse, and of Princess Louis of Battenberg.

Prince Albert of Schleswig-Holstein has been on a visit to Lord and Lady Dalhousie at Invermark Lodge. Excellent sport has been obtained at Invermark during the last two months. About 4,000 brace of grouse have been killed on the moors, and a large number of stags (including several with very fine heads) have been secured in the deer forest. The famous Rowan beat yielded a bag of nearly 600 brace of grouse in one day's driving. The Invermark shootings, which are on the borders of Aberdeenshire and Forfarshire, comprise about 30,000 acres, and they were always let between 1873 and 1900. Lord and Lady Dalhousie have left Invermark for the season, and they will reside for some time at Brechin Castle, the picturesque old seat of the Maules on the South Esk.

Princess Henry of Battenberg is to arrive at Kensington Palace next week from the Isle of Wight, and she will be in town for some time before going abroad. H.R.H. has been residing at Osborne Cottage since the end of June.

The Marquis de Soveral's resignation of his post as Portuguese Minister in London was, of course, inevitable. It was sent in just in time to anticipate his dismissal. It was out of the question for the Marquis de Soveral to continue in the employment of the Republican Government, as he is well known as a staunch Royalist, and one of the most trusted friends of King Carlos and Queen Amélie, and the present King, and he has always been on terms of close and confidential intimacy with all of them. The Marquis will probably continue to reside in England.

My Dublin correspondent writes:—

Lord and Lady Aberdeen take short holidays, as a rule. They have returned from Scotland, and are now settled for the season at the Viceregal Lodge, that is if "settling" is applicable to anyone in any position anywhere in this age of unrest, when life seems mainly concerned with hurryings to and fro. Miss Asquith has been amongst a small party of guests staying at the Viceregal Lodge, where there has been some quiet entertaining. As regards more serious Viceregal activities, needless to say, Lord and Lady Aberdeen have not been idle.

At one of the innumerable meetings which are endemic over here at this season Mr. Shane Leslie has, in the exuberance of a youthful spirit lately awakened to Gaelic views, been saying rude things of the Viceregal Court, which he styles "a standing joke amongst nations." Dublin Castle has long been a target for sarcasm, and yet it offers nothing so provocative to the hilarity of nations as Royal Courts offer on high State occasions when men—important officials—whom Nature has formed to walk forward shuffle backwards before the Sovereign as a manner of showing him honour. The wonder is where the honour to the Sovereign is supposed to come in through a man doing—and very badly, too, as a rule—the tricks of a performing poodle at a variety entertainment. No doubt there is a bit of a joke about every Court; but the biggest Court has the biggest joke for all that.

The Chief Secretary had to leave his visitors and suspend his hospitalities in the Phœnix Park last week on account of his attendance at the Conference being necessary. Amongst those who stayed at the Chief Secretary's Lodge were Lord and Lady Arran, Lord and Lady Plunket, and Sir Henry and Lady Robinson. This week Mrs. Birrell gives a large afternoon party, and invitations have been issued for several dinner parties by the Chief Secretary and Mrs. Birrell. The condition of society in Ireland requires special delicacy and tact in the practice of the social art of assorting guests. Classes and masses alike have taken kindly to boycotting. There is generally some boycott "on" in even the most exclusive and the official classes.

The Duke of Leinster, who is seriously ill, has always been delicate. His father and mother were both short-lived. The beautiful Duchess died in the zenith of her beauty. She was very popular in Ireland, and at Carton is much regretted. The present Duke kept up the tradition of being on friendly terms with his "people" in Kildare. His large property was amongst the first properties to be sold in Ireland under the latest thing in Land Acts. Carton has been practically shut up as far as being a social centre is concerned of late years.

Another once important social centre in Kildare, Moore Abbey, has never held the position since the death of the last Marquis of Drogheda. His kinsman who succeeded him as Earl of Drogheda, being an official in the Foreign Office, has not been able to take up his residence there owing to his official duties. The Dowager Lady Drogheda, his mother, is at Moore Abbey now, and will spend the winter there.

Sir John and Lady Arnott, with their family, are staying at their residence—one of the finest houses—in Merrion Square. Lady Arnott, who is an Englishwoman, is a clever lady of much social talent. She is a strong advocate of woman's suffrage, and does much to promote the suffragist movement in Ireland. Of late, Irishwomen have developed a strong taste for politics "on their own." Suffragist associations are now established in Ireland as they are across the water, and Irishwomen when they take up anything are nothing if not enthusiastic.

The late Lady Courtenay was the youngest daughter of Lord Chancellor Cottenham. She married Mr. H. R. Courtenay, afterwards Lord Courtenay, who died in 1898. Her eldest son succeeded his grandfather as Earl of Devon in 1904, and her younger sons are both in the Church, the one being rector of Honiton and the other rector of Powderham, a living which was held by his grandfather for over half a century. Lady Courtenay resided for many years at Exeter, as her husband held an official appointment in connection with the Poor-law Board; but since 1892 she had resided at Kenton, near Starcross, a village which is quite near to Powderham Castle, Lord Devon's picturesque old seat on the Exe estuary. Lady Courtenay was actively connected with many charities and public institutions, and she was an enthusiastic Church worker.

That gallant centenarian, Colonel John Bower, of Droxford, was not only the oldest officer in the Army, but the oldest foxhunter in Great Britain. He saw his first fox killed when hunting with the Fife pack a few months after Waterloo, and he hunted zealously during his service in India and South Africa. His Indian service extended from 1826 to 1849. On returning to England he settled at Droxford, and became a regular follower of the Hambledon pack, of which he was master for three seasons. To the last he was a well-known and popular character in East Hants. He rode to hounds until about ten years ago, and eighteen months ago the members of the Hunt presented him with a silver salver in commemoration of his 100th birthday. Colonel Bower succeeded the late Sir Henry Keppel in the occupation of Droxford Lodge.

The late Lord Low was a very able lawyer, and he proved a most admirable judge. His large practice at the Bar had made him thoroughly familiar with all the ramifications of Scottish legal procedure. His judgments were very lucid and convincing, and on several occasions—notably in the great Menzies case—his view was accepted by the final Court of Appeal after it had been reversed by the intermediate tribunal. He was really a great jurist, as well as highly popular in the profession. He lived as much as possible at The Laws, his place in Berwickshire, and he was a general favourite in the county. He was a keen sportsman, and was well known as a fine angler, a capital shot, and a hard rider after hounds.

Lord Low resigned his place in the Court of Session only about a week before his death. Neither the Lord Advocate nor the Solicitor-General desires to be shelved, so Mr. G. L. Macfarlane, Sheriff of Fife and Kinross, is to be the new judge. He is a son of the late Lord Ormidale, and has for many years enjoyed a large and varied practice, being regarded as a thoroughly sound lawyer, with an exceptional knowledge of case law. He has discovered essentially judicial qualities since he replaced Lord Cullen as Sheriff of Fife and Kinross. He is a staunch Liberal, but has never taken a prominent part in politics.

The death of Lady Katherine Parker will be very much regretted throughout an extensive district of South Devon, as she was very charitable, and took a deep interest in the welfare of her poorer neighbours. She was a generous supporter of many philanthropic institutions in the West of England. Lady Katherine, who was a sister of the late Earl of Morley, had resided since her mother's death at Whiteway, near Chudleigh. The late Lady Morley inherited this place and the considerable property from her father, Mr. Montagu E. Parker. When she married the second Earl of Morley she was the widow of Mr. William Coryton, of Pentillie Castle, Cornwall. The Whiteway estates now pass to Lord Morley.

The Duke of Westminster left Southampton on Saturday for South Africa. The Duchess has gone for a yachting cruise in the Mediterranean, accompanied by her father, Colonel Cornwallis West. They will pay a visit to Prince and Princess of Pless at their estate in Silesia before returning to England. The Duke and Duchess of Westminster are expected at Eaton Hall about a week before Christmas, intending to spend the remainder of the hunting season in Cheshire.

The Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch have arrived at Montagu House from Langholm Lodge, Dumfriesshire, where they have been residing for about two months. The Duke and Duchess will spend the next few months at Drumlanrig Castle, the magnificent old seat of the Dukes of Queensberry on the Nith, after which they are going to Dalkeith Palace for the remainder of the winter.

---

Mrs. Ronald Greville has returned to Polesden Lacey, near Dorking, where she received her first week-end party from Saturday until Monday, the guests including Count Albert Mensdorff-Pouilly (who has just returned to the Austro-Hungarian Embassy from Vienna) and Sir Hedworth and Lady Lambton.

The Duke and Duchess of Rutland, who have been residing since the end of July at Stanton Woodhouse, their place near Rowsley, are to remove shortly to Belvoir Castle, where they will be in constant residence for about six months.

The French railway strike was an ugly event, and the Times is doubtless right in holding that its significance is not destroyed by its sudden and ignominious collapse. The movement was spasmodic, ill-considered, and ill-organised, but the spirit which prompted it is a dangerous spirit, and the momentary mastery of the situation which they gained cannot fail to show both leaders and followers, and the French proletariat generally, what they can do if they mean business.

Apparently the strikers did not quite mean business this time. They went out in a hurry without any idea of a fight to a finish. They had not made sure of the support and sympathy of the populace at large. They were disconcerted by the strong measures of the Government, and their resolution failed when they saw what they were in for if they persisted. This makes them look very silly, and must discredit such movements for the time. But these results can only be counted upon when the movement is a half-hearted one. It is the business of the Government to use the advantage it has gained in taking steps to prevent such movements ever having any heart in them in future. That is the only defensive measure of any value.

No doubt the situation was sufficiently alarming to justify the use of extreme measures, and the majority of people, in France and outside, will consider that the means used by the Government are justified by the end which was gained. Yet I cannot help thinking that the calling out of the reservists was a dangerous step, and that it may be regretted in time to come. You cannot use a national army against a popular movement as you can a mercenary one—at least, you cannot do it without putting a dangerous strain upon your military organisation. Discipline in the French army has stood the strain this time, but when the railway men were called out of the ranks of the strikers to join the ranks of the army which was to repress the strike, the authorities must have had an anxious moment while the effect of the step was awaited. If the experiment had failed the consequences must have been disastrous to the country, and no one would have found words too strong to condemn those who undertook it.

As it is, an unanswerable argument has been supplied to the Socialist who teaches the people that the army is an instrument for their enslavement. Henceforth the French labour leader, if he understands his business, will devote himself with redoubled energy to teaching the soldier that the State has no right to employ him against his own comrades of the proletariat, that his military service is given for the protection of his country against foreign enemies, not for the protection of native employers against the just demands of native workmen. The anti-military spirit is strong enough in France already without such incentives as have now been administered to it.

From a Daily Express poster I learnt last week that the French strike represented a vast "Socialist upheaval." From the same journal a few weeks previously it appeared that "Tariff Reform means Security." If by security in this connection is meant security against Socialism or social disorder, investors must be beginning by this time to look on the security as rather rotten. A fortnight ago, a whole quarter of Berlin was in the hands of a riotous mob as the outcome of a strike. Now Paris has been visited with a "great Socialist upheaval," even more alarming in its character, through another labour dispute. Germany has also narrowly escaped during the past week a ship-building strike involving 400,000 hands. If we are bidden to believe after this that high tariffs are the best remedy for socialistic movements and labour troubles, the only suitable answer seems to be "fiddlestick!"

It is worthy of note, too, from the British point of view, that one of the main demands on which the French railway hands struck was for a minimum wage of 5 francs a day for men in Paris, the reason for this demand being the great and increasing cost of living. In France, as in Germany, the rising price of food is the immediate cause of all labour troubles; in both countries the demand for higher wages goes hand in hand with the cry for the reduction or remission of the duties on imported food. I would call attention here to what my Paris correspondent says on this subject in another column. It requires a good deal of hardihood under these circumstances to keep an agitation on foot in this country for the introduction of food taxes, and to preach that such taxes will always be paid by the foreigner (or the Colonial, who is thereby to be bound tighter to the Empire), and that they cannot fail to conduce to universal prosperity and contentment. Perseverance under difficulties is usually admirable, but the reiteration of tariff reform shibboleths in the face of what we see all around us at present is only ludicrous.

Here is sad news for those patriotic Britishers who attempt to cheat the revenue of their country by depositing their securities in America. The Economist reports that the Legislature of the State of New York has lately passed a law raising the maximum rate of the death duties from 5 to 25 per cent.; and there is said to be little doubt that this example will be speedily followed by other States in the Union. Under penalty of a very heavy fine trust companies, banks, and other institutions holding securities are required not to deliver the same to the executors or representatives of a deceased owner without retaining a sufficient portion to pay the tax.

It is said to be increasingly the practice for wealthy people here to make foreign investments and lodge the securities abroad, where interest and dividends are at once re-invested, in order to escape the English income tax. I look upon this as an essentially dishonest proceeding. It really means that the revenue here is defrauded, and that the burden evaded by these people falls upon the rest of the taxpayers. It is therefore rather diverting to think of the consternation that this New York law will create among British citizens. In the event of a death New York may take a toll of as much as one-quarter of the capital so deposited, and after that the estate will, of course, still have to pay the English death duties.

By the way, the maximum English death duty, applicable only to estates valued at upwards of one million sterling, is but 15 per cent., as against the 25 per cent. now imposed in the State of New York. After all the whips of Mr. Lloyd George are more easy to bear than the scorpions of New York.

Even the optimism of Mr. Garvin seems to have yielded for the moment to the force of awkward facts. He informed his readers on Sunday that the chances of the Unionist party—which in this instance means, I take it, the tariff reform interest—gaining anything worth having from a general election at the present juncture are decidedly precarious. Like other Tariff Reformers, he does not like trade booms. They are succeeded by the inevitable reaction (a phenomenon, I may remark, seen most conspicuously in all Protectionist countries, particularly the United States), and tariff reform hay is best made when the sun is not shining. Mr. Garvin is also clearly conscious that the House of Lords question is not exactly the stuff out of which a strong Unionist reaction can be manufactured with certainty, even at the best of times.

A general election is generally more or less a leap in the dark. The years 1900 and 1906 were only exceptions to the general rule on this point. But I should think Mr. Garvin reads the omens wisely, having read them much the same way myself only a week or two ago. There is no good reason to suppose that a general election next January would yield a very different result from that of January last, and if neither party has much hope of improving its position there is reason on both sides for avoiding an election. This is the strongest ground for hoping that the Constitutional Conference will arrive at some result sufficiently definite to justify the postponement of a general election. When, however, Mr. Garvin goes on to propose a sort of system of government by coalition conferences between the Front Benches, and to foresee the solution by this process of all outstanding constitutional and "imperial" questions, he seems to ascend into the clouds and to lose sight of the ground on which ordinary politicians are compelled to stand.

The eight Ministers who are engaged in the Constitutional Conference may have their faults, but no one will ever say of them hereafter that they cannot keep a secret. Like everybody else, I have been curious to know how the eight are getting on, and the efforts that I have made to obtain enlightenment have pretty well satisfied me that unless one of the eight was disposed to give the information, nobody else could. That this is the true state of the case is pretty conclusively established by the hopeless contradiction among those journalists who pretend to know. It is not that the Ministerial organs say one thing and the Opposition organs another, according to their wont, but on each side the prophets are hopelessly at variance among themselves. As all get their inspiration from what are usually called "well-informed" quarters, it is pretty evident that nobody knows anything definite—outside the sacred conclave.

The protests that have been made against the opposition to Sir J. Simon's re-election are perfectly just. As they mostly come from Liberals, it is to be hoped that Liberals will be of the same way of thinking when the question arises of opposing the re-election of a political opponent who has been promoted to the Government. But the best way to ensure all parties following this counsel of perfection is to repeal the statute which necessitates re-election under such circumstances. It is a statute, if I remember rightly, of Queen Anne, and so far as it has any relation to the exigencies and conditions of contemporary politics it is as defunct as her late Majesty. Nobody would object to its repeal. Every M.P. who hopes to become a member of a Government is interested in repealing it. Why then is it left on the statute book?

A correspondent writes:—

An evening paper has published an article entitled "Disraelian Fact and Fiction," which conveys several erroneous impressions. Lord Beaconsfield's "many sojourns" at Cuddesden with Bishop Samuel Wilberforce are purely imaginative. He may have gone to Cuddesden for some "function," but there never was any sort of intimacy between the Tory leader and "S. O." They disliked each other exceedingly. Lord Beaconsfield described the Bishop to the life in "Lothair" in by no means flattering terms, and Wilberforce bitterly resented his being passed over for the see of London in 1868 when Tait was promoted to Canterbury.

The friendship between the Puseys and Disraeli is also mythical, and there was no acquaintance between Lord George Bentinck and Disraeli until 1845. Sir Robert Peel did wish to challenge Disraeli, as is recorded by Charles Greville, and it is untrue that he ever asked either Lord Lincoln or anyone else to challenge Lord George Bentinck on his behalf.

Disraeli was not put on his feet by the "patrimony" which he inherited, but by his marriage with Mrs. Wyndham Lewis, who had a jointure of £5,000 a year, with a house in Grosvenor Gate which was kept up for her. The marriage took place many years before the death of Isaac Disraeli.

Disraeli was no more in personal contact with the men who made the Oxford Movement than with the men who made the French Revolution. His name is not to be found in any of the numerous works on the subject which have been published, nor is there any reference to the subject in his own "Letters to His Sister." During the Oxford Movement he was absorbed with society and politics.

If the present censorship of plays should be abolished, and there is some ground for hoping that this may come to pass, one of the people who will have done much to bring about the abolition of the post will be Mr. Redford himself. The singular folly of his actions has been again and again pointed out, but it was once more clearly illustrated by Mr. Laurence Housman when he read a paper last Sunday to the O.P. Club and asked the members to pass a resolution condemning the office. Mr. Housman's play, "Pains and Penalties," has been banned, as most people know, and the author was refused any reason as to why it was judged improper. When, however, a reporter goes to see him, Mr. Redford makes the impertinent statement that Mr. Housman's anxiety to have reasons given him, and that the agitation which he is heading, are only part of a scheme to advertise the Little Theatre. Why should an author seek to advertise a theatre which may not produce his play? Would it not be wiser for the Censor to maintain a sphinxlike and impenetrable silence instead of insulting people who are smarting under his foolish judgments?

An amusing letter read at the meeting above referred to came from Mr. Zangwill, who pointed out that Shakespeare treated Henry VIII. dramatically within a few years of that monarch's death. Assuming, then, that it is some reference to George IV. which is so unpalatable to the Lord Chamberlain, we have far less dramatic freedom now than in Elizabeth's day. I quite sympathise with Mr. Henry Arthur Jones when he asks that we should be told where the line is to be drawn. "Is George III. available or Queen Anne or Charles I.? It would be well to have the matter settled."

Joking apart, what has become of the famous committee and of its report, and how long are dramatists to be the only people who, when condemned, have no locus standi and no right to be heard? It is the duty of playgoers, says Mr. Housman, to make "a disreputable office disreputable in the public eye," and there is much in what he says, but I think he may count upon Mr. Redford's support, for if he will only continue to make a foolish office look foolish in the public eye this will be of manifest assistance. Nothing kills like ridicule.

Mr. J. W. Clark, who died last week at Cambridge, passed his whole life at Cambridge, and his close connection with the University extended over fifty-two years. He was educated at Eton, and gained in succession a scholarship at Trinity, the highest classical honours, and a Trinity fellowship. In early life he travelled extensively, and he was always fond of visiting the Continent. He made a special study of French architecture and literature, and he was well known in Paris at the Bibliothèque Nationale. For twenty-five years Mr. Clark was Superintendent of the Museum of Zoology, and he worked zealously and with conspicuous success to promote the study of the natural sciences at Cambridge. He was Registrar for nineteen years, and filled this post with admirable efficiency. His versatility was astonishing, and he had an insatiable appetite for work. His house was the centre of a constant and most delightful hospitality, for he was a first-rate talker and raconteur, and he will be greatly missed in almost every field of Cambridge life. In politics Mr. Clark was a Liberal, and he was always an active University reformer.

Mr. J. N. Keynes, of Pembroke College, has been unanimously elected by the Senate of Cambridge University to the important office of Registrary, which was resigned by Mr. J. W. Clark only about ten days before his death. The salary is £700 a year. The appointment was fully expected, and it gives general satisfaction in the University. Mr. Keynes has most efficiently filled several important offices, including that of secretary to the Council of the Senate.

The Archbishop of York has presented the Rev. Dr. Solloway, rector of Holy Trinity Priory Church, York, and chaplain to the Lord Mayor of York, to the important living of Selby, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Maurice Parker. Dr. Solloway is very popular in York, where he has worked with conspicuous success for fifteen years, being incidentally known as an antiquary and a great authority on the history of York and its numerous ecclesiastical establishments. He has carefully restored his church at York, and he will be an admirable custodian for the historic abbey of Selby.

The Archdeacon of Richmond was last week installed as canon residentiary of Ripon Cathedral on the nomination of the Bishop of the diocese. It is understood that Archdeacon Armstrong Hall is to go into residence at Ripon for three months on January 1, and that he will then resign the rectory of Methley. His new preferment is worth £700 a year.

---

The Bishop of Lincoln has presented the Rev. W. A. Purey-Cust, rector of Belton, near Grantham, to the important living of St. Peter—in Eastgate—with St. Margaret's, Lincoln, vacant by the death of the Rev. H. T. Morgan. Mr. Purey-Cust, who is a son of the Dean of York and Lady Emma Purey-Cust, has held the living of Belton for twenty-eight years, and previously he worked for two years in New Zealand. The rectory of Belton, which is in the gift of Lord Brownlow, is of the net value of about £320 a year, with an excellent house. The church at Belton is filled with the handsome Cust monuments, most of them by eminent sculptors.

The following letter is interesting as showing that patrons have their reasons for disliking the present state of the law as well as the clergy and the reforming laity:

It is a great pity that when the Benefices Act was brought in the sale of livings was not abolished and compensation given to private owners. Instead of that, which would have been an honest course, all sorts of barbed-wire entanglements were placed round the sale of advowsons, whereby the property was lowered in value by at least one-half, and people were afraid to buy, this entailing heavy loss upon those clergy who were their own patrons. I know of a living just sold for £2,500, which before the passing of the Benefices Act would have been worth £4,500. This is what a Conservative Government, backed up by the Archbishops and Bishops, who were very keen upon it, has done for the clergy. The Benefices Act has not done anything to do away with the sale of advowsons, but has reduced the value to the impoverishment of the unhappy owners.

I have received a good deal of correspondence with reference to the subject dealt with last week in the article "The Church and the Patron." One correspondent writes:—

Under the Benefices Act of 1898 the transfer of a right of patronage is invalid unless the whole interest of the transferor is transferred (excepting in certain cases which do not affect the point), and, furthermore, the transfer must be registered in the diocesan registry. It is quite clear that under the Act the sale of a next presentation is invalid, and it is difficult to see how the sale in the case of the advertisement you quote could be carried out.

I am not prepared to dispute my correspondent's statement of the law, but notwithstanding the Act of 1898, next presentations are still offered for sale from time to time. Whether the law is evaded, and if so how, are matters on which I am ignorant. But may not the next presentation be occasionally the whole of the vendor's interest?

So far as the observations in last week's Truth are concerned, the fact of the advertisement which was quoted having reference to a next presentation, the sale of which the Benefices Act endeavoured to stop, rather accentuates its significance. But it was a pure accident that I happened to select an advertisement relative to a next presentation. Here is a precisely similar one relating to an advowson, which I had before me at the same time, and in which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners figure in the same way:—

The Advowson of a Rectory in Shropshire . . . Population 107. Area 1,415 Acres.

|---|---|---|---|
| Commuted tithe rent charge ..... | 215 | 0 | 0 |
| Payment by Ecclesiastical Commissioners ... | 100 | 0 | 0 |
| | £315 | 0 | 0 |

The Rectory House is commodious, with good garden, stabling, and orchard . . . Price, with possible speedy possession, £1,500.

The references to the probabilities of "vacant possessions" are one of the most disgusting features of this traffic.

Judging from one or two of the letters that have reached me, Lord Robert Cecil, or any other Churchman undertaking the business of a reformer, would do well to bestow as much consideration on the case of the curate as that of the beneficed parson. The former concerns the interest of the Church equally, and I am disposed to think that the curate has the first claim to consideration, both on the ground of expediency and justice. One of my correspondents mentions the following points requiring attention under this head:—

When a new incumbent comes to a parish, a curate can be ejected in six weeks, even though he has done excellent work in the parish for many years, is popular with the parishioners, and nothing is alleged against him. Even when it is not a case of a new incumbent being appointed, a curate can always be ejected at six months' notice without any reason assigned, provided the incumbent obtains the bishop's assent. The proviso is of little value, for the bishop's assent is generally a matter of form. Mistakes are often made in giving it, only to be discovered after serious mischief has been done in the parish.

Again, it seems strange that a curate should be considered "too old" at 40 or 45, while a bishop who is over 70 should be encouraged to have his diocese divided, and his work lightened.

I would ask whether the conditions under which curacies are held are calculated to attract as candidates for ordination many men except non-graduates, whose education has been inexpensive?

The last paragraph contains the point which makes this question of most importance to the Church. The dearth of candidates for ordination, especially from Oxford and Cambridge, is a perennial subject of lamentation in ecclesiastical circles. Undoubtedly one cause of this trouble is the unsatisfactory position of the curate in regard to pay, tenure, and prospects. To induce him to accept this position at present a young man must have either private means, influence with the dispensers of patronage, or such as burning enthusiasm for the clerical calling that prudential considerations do not trouble him.

The question of security of tenure does not concern the curate alone. It is by no means desirable that a vicar should be able to dismiss a curate at his own sole discretion, without regard to justice or to the wishes of his congregation. The existence of this absolute power renders every curate completely subservient to his vicar, whereas if he has reached years of discretion he might exercise a certain independence with good effect in cases where vicars are disposed to be too autocratic. It is no unknown thing for a vicar to be jealous of an able and popular curate, and to get rid of him for that reason. What can be more scandalous? It is equally unfair both to the man and the parish, and the fear of incurring the jealousy of a narrow-minded vicar may deter a prudent man from doing the best that is in him. If what my correspondent says above as to the perfunctory exercise of the bishop's veto on the arbitrary dismissal of a curate at six months' notice is at all of general application, bishops cannot be too strongly blamed on this account.

---

It is suggested by one of my correspondents that the parish of Romford is one of those where a reform in the direction of a periodical moving-on of incumbents would be appreciated. What may be the truth about this I cannot say, but if there is any ground for the observation things must have changed there rather rapidly. Romford was the present Bishop of Colchester's parish, and he left behind him a very large and enthusiastic congregation as well as a considerable reputation. As he only left last year it is rather early for the parish to be yearning for another change of incumbents.

Apropos of a paragraph in last week's Truth I have been furnished with an interesting correspondence in which the Rev. R. H. Fisher, editor of the Church of Scotland magazine Life and Work, was tackled by an elder of the Kirk on the subject of certain advertisements appearing in that periodical. The advertisements to which the elder took exception included one emanating from a home employment trickster and others from quacks who are pilloried in the Truth Cautionary List. Mr. Fisher's defence is extremely instructive. After stating that "a strict censorship" was exercised and that the publishers assured him that inquiry had been made about every one of the advertisements, he wrote:—

> Some of them come through highly respectable advertising agents, and about none of them is there any more reason to suspect fraud than in the case of almost any advertisements that can be named. It is always easy to say that an article does not meet all the descriptions of it which an advertisement gives. As I said in a former letter, the mere fact that Truth has expressed an unfavourable opinion about an advertisement is far from being a sufficient ground of condemnation. Almost any medical prescription might meet with unfriendly criticism from a practitioner other than the one who prescribed it.
> Roughly speaking, this is my difficult position: Admittedly some patent medicines (e.g., Chlorodyne, Cockle's and Carter's pills) are useful preparations which can be properly advertised; quite certainly some are useless. But how am I to know? What rule can I follow but to reject anything which is indecent or manifestly fraudulent? People are quite accustomed to judge advertisements for themselves, and I do not think that in these days there are many who fancy that any journal recommends the purchase of articles which it advertises.

---

These are the disingenuous excuses which I have heard time after time from the conductors of secular newspapers whose columns are used for the duping and fleecing of innocent readers. The editor of a Church magazine might surely be expected to display a higher conception of his duty and set a good example to the lay press. Mr. Fisher thinks he has done enough if he rejects "anything which is indecent or manifestly fraudulent," but, as he must be well aware, there are any number of advertisements which, though not fraudulent in the criminal sense of the term, are obviously a cruel imposition upon simple-minded people. In the case of quacks the remedies sold are often not merely useless but positively harmful to the suffering and afflicted purchasers. To pretend that it is impossible to distinguish between nostrums of this character and such patent medicines as those Mr. Fisher mentions is puerile nonsense. Newspapers which have a regard for their reputation do it every day.

---

I wonder what sort of "inquiry" the publishers of Life and Work made about the celebrated Dr. Crippen's "Aural Remedies Company" or the "Murray Ear Drum," "The Magic Foot Draft," and the "Ward Chemical Company"? These are among the advertisements published in this religious magazine. Another is that of the National Home Employment Association. Mr. Fisher may be interested to learn that the parties running this last concern have just been arrested on charges of fraud.

Since writing the above I have seen a further letter from Mr. Fisher, in which he states that the question of these advertisements has been considered at a meeting of the committee in charge of Life and Work. It seems that the committee were "impressed with the necessity of great care," but

> On the other hand, it is obvious that there is a danger in discontinuing or refusing any advertisement as fraudulent or immoral without adequate proof that it deserves such a description. The mere fact that an advertiser was denounced in Truth—a wealthy newspaper which invites prosecutions as its means of subsistence—is not enough to encourage Life and Work—a modest journal which does not seek such notoriety—to take the same attitude.

The statement that Truth "invites prosecutions as its means of subsistence" is an impudent and baseless fiction, as any sensible person must know perfectly well. The suggestion—repeated later on in the letter—that Life and Work would incur the risk of a prosecution by rejecting an advertisement is childish nonsense. Of course, this Church of Scotland Committee are not such utter fools as to imagine that they need give any reason at all, let alone any reason which would be libellous, for discontinuing or refusing an advertisement. No. The advertisements in question "were worth to the magazine £213 this year," and so a blind eye is turned to the fact that they are advertisements which no well-conducted newspaper would admit to its columns.

At the recent conference—the first—of the British Hospital Association held at Glasgow the thorny question of the treatment of hospital nurses was not, so far as I have seen, discussed. If it had been, some very excellent illustrations of how nurses should not be treated might have been obtained locally at the Western Infirmary of Glasgow. There the rules allow of the exercise of a petty tyranny which would be deemed intolerable in any other profession. For instance, lights are switched off in the nurses' quarters at 10.30, while the use of candles is forbidden. Thus, as nurses go on day duty at 7 a.m. they are compelled in the winter months to dress themselves in the dark, while members of the staff who may be returning to the hospital by a late train at the termination of an outside engagement are equally compelled to dispense with light on their retirement to rest.

But the principal cause for complaint by the nursing staff is the agreement which is put forward for them to sign when entering the infirmary as probationers. By this they bind themselves to remain in the service of the hospital for a term of four years, the wages being £10 the first year, £15 the second and third years, at the end of which the nurse is presumed to receive a certificate of proficiency and qualify for a salary of £25. Should she, however, leave before the completion of the term she may be required to refund any part of the wages she has received at the discretion of the authorities, who also have it in their power to dispense with her services at any time. That women can be found to submit to such unfair and one-sided conditions is a curious example of their lack of appreciation of their own value in the nursing world, but that is no reason why advantage should be taken of their ignorance by the hospital authorities.

Of all the appeals which I am asked to make on behalf of charitable objects I do not know of any which better deserves consideration than the scheme for providing a night shelter for women and girls which Mrs. Mackirdy has been working at so strenuously. The homeless woman or girl who still sets value on her respectability seems to have been forgotten till Mrs. Mackirdy remembered her. There are homes for the fallen and depraved, but for the friendless woman the common lodging-house and the casual ward, with their degrading associations, are the only alternatives to the street. It is to provide a shelter for such that funds are needed. Twelve thousand pounds is the total needed to make such an institution self-supporting. Six thousand pounds will enable it to be started; £4,000 has already been obtained. Any one who will help to make up the balance should communicate either with the treasurer, Lady Brassey, at 24, Park Lane, or Mrs. Mackirdy, at Orchardway, Hayward's Heath.

A correspondent sends me the last annual report of the London Institution for Lost and Starving Cats, in the hope that its perusal will lead me to modify my opinion of Mrs. Morgan's enterprise. Unfortunately, it has had precisely the opposite effect. Details are given of the work of the society over a number of years. From this table I learn that in 1901 15,738 cats were received and £3,178 was expended. In other words, in 1901 it cost Mrs. Morgan 4s. to kill each cat. In 1909 £1,892 was the expenditure incurred in passing 15,944 through the lethal chamber, roughly 2s. 6d. a head. This shows a considerable saving, it is true, but it is still a most uneconomical method of killing cats. Besides, such an enormous variation in the cost of killing cats in 1901 and 1909 is not productive of confidence in the management of the institution; on the contrary, it suggests that Mrs. Morgan is prepared to dispose of cats and cash in any quantity that they reach her. In addition, it is evident from the report that the institution is still practically under the sole control of Mrs. Morgan, whom, for reasons which have been fully set forth in Truth, I do not consider to be quite the sort of person to be entrusted with the administration of charitable funds.

I have to acknowledge the following contributions to the Toy Fund:—A Naval Officer, £1 1s.; Skylark, 10s.

Judging from the correspondence which I am receiving, the Times military correspondent has made out a true bill for pedantry against the young Staff officer of the day, and as the average British officer in the raw state is the reverse of a pedant, the fault must be with the system which turns the Staff College into an elementary school, and treats the officer students as boys. The outdoor work at the College is all right, but there is not enough of it, while the indoor course is far too scholastic as a preparation for professional service. A correspondent—himself a p.s.c. man—says half the time indoors is spent in writing out fair notes in copperplate hand from rough notes made during the lectures. This may be right enough for boys who are learning the art of composition, but it is ridiculous for officers who are being taught the art of war. Printing, as my correspondent remarks, has been invented a good many years, and the Camberley establishment should make use of it.

I am convinced, however, that the War Office curriculum has an even more emasculating influence on the young officer than the course at the Staff College. Excluding directors and staff officers of the first grade, who may or may not be in their right places as superintendents of the Headquarter Staff work, there are some fifty-six officers of the second and third grade employed in the department of the Chief of the General Staff. With the exception of one week in the year these officers sit on chairs in Whitehall from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., packed two, three, and four in a room, and performing for the most part duties analogous to those which fall to the lot of second division clerks in the Civil Service—such as correcting maps, extracting press cuttings from Truth and other newspapers, compiling returns, and generally doing the work of glorified office boys. Occupied thus for fifty-one weeks in the year, can we wonder if they find it difficult during the fifty-second week to descend from "Cloudland" to the manœuvre ground and deal successfully with the hundred and one practical details which make up the life of the Staff officer in the field?

Space did not allow last week of replying to all the questions of the general staff officer who wrote to me regarding the first Truth article on "Misdirected Manœuvres," but if my correspondent will show the article to his Director or to the Chief of the General Staff I am sure either of these officials will be able to furnish answers to his queries and reassure him in regard to points about which he required elucidation. I would only take leave to remind him that expert knowledge and common sense are not synonymous terms, and it is quite possible to be richly endowed with the former without having any share of the latter qualification for forming judgment and expressing opinion.

How can those above expect those below to obey orders if they set an example of disobedience themselves? Take the case of the Royal Hibernian Military School. The school is governed under a Royal Charter, which, like other Charters, is granted to the Corporation concerned by Letters Patent and duly enrolled in his Majesty's High Court of Chancery. Under the terms of the Charter the Commander of the Forces in Ireland is empowered, "with the approbation of the Commander-in-Chief," to appoint an officer as adjutant and secretary, "provided that the person appointed shall not be lower in rank than a captain." Yet the Army List shows that the late adjutant, who was a major, has been succeeded by a lieutenant. A correspondent suggests that the lieutenant is a "talented" man, and I am ready to believe it; but, talented or not talented, his appointment is illegal, and he has no more right to be adjutant of the Royal Hibernian Military School than I have.

In trampling on the Royal Charter injustice has been done not only to the school, but to the qualified captain or major who ought to have been selected to fill the post of adjutant in compliance with the provisions of the charter. For so important a position as adjutant and secretary of a large military school an officer of higher rank and experience than lieutenant is decidedly required. The pay of the appointment was fixed on this understanding by those who were responsible for the Charter, and had the rank of lieutenant been considered sufficient for the duties the pay would have been correspondingly apportioned. As the case stands, by the infraction of the Charter a lieutenant is drawing major's pay. I am quite sure that no Commander-in-Chief would have sanctioned this, or if he had done so he would have had the House of Commons on his back.

I would call attention to the letter on compulsory military service in relation to national physique which appears in another column. The point which the writer makes is not new, but the argument appears to me unanswerable. From the nature of the case the men whose physique most requires improvement are just the men who escape military service. It is so in Continental countries, and it would be still more so with us, since our need of mere numbers is less pressing. What is true of physique applies in some measure to the moral advantages which are attributed to military training. The section of the community which stands most in need of the inculcation of "habits of order and obedience" is precisely the section of which the largest proportion will be rejected for military service on physical grounds.

Even, however, if it were true that compulsory military service offers any remedy for physical degeneration, the answer would remain that this is not a reason for the establishment of a conscript army. If the promised result had been attained on the Continent it would have been by accident, not by purpose; and if the Continental nations saw no military reason for maintaining their armies they would never dream of maintaining them merely as instruments of physical training. Why not? Because the desired end could be gained by more scientific means more effectively and much more cheaply. To establish a national conscript army in order to improve national physique would be like burning down your house to cook your pig, with the additional disadvantage that the pig would not be cooked. The maintenance of an army can only be justified on military grounds, and if collateral reasons are advanced in favour of it it can only be because the military reasons are insufficient.

It is my fate to be constantly calling attention to breaches of regulations by those who make them. Under Paragraph 1,490 of the King's Regulations the period of service for troops stationed in the Mediterranean is five years, and in pursuance of this regulation men count on being sent home as soon as their five years have expired. Quite recently some dozen Artillerymen who had done five years in Malta last August were detained in the island although other men with less than four years' Mediterranean service were sent home in the hired transport Soudan, which left Malta for England on September 24 last. Whatever reason there may have been for this departure from rule, it is not likely to satisfy the disappointed men, who trust to the King's Regulations as they do to their Bible. Nothing is more harmful to discipline than any breach of official faith on the part of the authorities, and I hope Sir Herbert Miles will see that this grievance is removed by ordering the men home with the least possible delay.

The second act in the great military farce in which Captain Bennet-Stanford, of the 1st South-Western Mounted Brigade, Transport and Supply Column (Territorials), played the lead, took place at Salisbury last week. A special court was convened in the Council Chamber, and the gallant captain appeared as complainant to make good his case against the base-born rabble who refused to obey his orders at Winterbourne Stoke. He must feel very sore at the result, for all the summonses but one, which was adjourned sine die, were dismissed. Evidently the magistrates took the view that drinking beer in an "insulting manner" was not an offence under the Military Manœuvres Act, and that to take a whip from a man who was lashing out with it to enforce obedience to unwarrantable orders was not a punishable assault. I have charitably attributed Captain Bennet-Stanford's action to excess of zeal, but it really does seem worth the consideration of the War Office whether such a very zealous officer should be retained in H.M. service.

The good people who bewail the prevalence of the cigarette habit will be horrified to hear that the consumption of these noxious smokes by the British troops in India is estimated at 320,000 per day. This figure is given in a letter designed to show how severely the soldier is hit by the new Indian tobacco duty. The writer's theory is that as the packet of ten cigarettes formerly sold at one anna now costs two annas the duty means the extraction of something like £48,000 per annum from the pocket of poor Tommy Atkins. But this, of course, must be a mere hallucination. Let Tommy ask any of our Tariff Reformers about it. They will give him the most positive assurances that the consumer does not pay the duty.

Captain Michael Culme-Seymour has vacated the post of Assistant Director of Naval Intelligence, and will take over command of the cruiser Argyll at the end of November. Captain Brook, who is in command of the King Edward VII., will succeed the first-named officer at the Admiralty.

The selection of Rear-Admiral Sir John Jellicoe to succeed Prince Louis of Battenberg in the command of the Atlantic Fleet conforms to Service anticipations. Admiral Jellicoe, who is imbued with Fisher doctrines, has proved a sound and economic controller. His service includes a long record of administrative work at the Admiralty; but ten years ago he was badly wounded whilst serving as chief staff officer to Sir Edward Seymour in China. Rear-Admiral Charles John Briggs, who will succeed Rear-Admiral Jellicoe, was recently relieved by Rear-Admiral Sturdee from a flag command in the First Home Fleet. He is regarded as an officer of great organising ability, but probably very few Service men suspected that he would be the next Controller.

Captain Sir Robert Keith Arbuthnot is advanced to the rank of commodore, second class, and appointed to the Boadicea for the command of the First Destroyer Flotilla. Captain Arbuthnot quite recently paid off the Lord Nelson in the First Home Fleet. He is succeeding Commodore Charlton in his new billet.

Colonel-Commandant H. C. Money, to whom I recently had occasion to refer in connection with the injustice done to a lance-corporal, summarily punished against the overwhelming weight of evidence, gets his step as major-general in a general post of senior officers of Royal Marines. As a consequence, he vacates the command of the Stonehouse Division. General Money has a distinguished service record in Zululand, Egypt, the Sudan, and South Africa.

The promotion of Major-General Money has necessitated his resignation of the distinction of Marine A.D.C. to the King. This has been bestowed upon Lieut.-Colonel Alfred E. Marchant, C.B., of the Red Marines.

A few days since Commander G. C. Quayle was appointed to the Glory. This was followed almost immediately by the announcement that Commander Quayle had been placed upon the retired list, at his own request. They are saying in the Service that Mr. Hall Caine is responsible for this incident, and that the gallant commander's courage failed him at the prospect of what ward-room humour might make of the conjunction of Glory and Quayle.

The cruiser Niobe has been made over to the Canadian Government, and she left Devonport last week for Halifax. The Niobe and the Rainbow have been acquired by Canada for training purposes. The Canadian Navy is to be managed on strictly temperance principles, and the grog tap will be entirely abolished. There is to be a teetotal canteen, but the victualling arrangements will be much superior in many respects to those at home, and the pay of both officers and men is to be higher. It is proposed to make special arrangements for the training of officers to serve in the Canadian Navy at Osborne and at Dartmouth.

The Resolution is noted for removal from the Baltic Fleet to the Motherbank. This means the beginning of the end for the "Royal Sovereigns." I still maintain that it is a pity for ships which embody all the principles of modern design, and could both give and take very hard knocks, to be scrapped. The Admiralty view is that the relatively small combatant value of this twenty-year-old class does not justify expenditure on their maintenance. This is a corollary of the current policy of devoting every available halfpenny to new construction. But in the storm and stress of a modern naval war, when the rival "Dreadnoughts" have crippled one another, and the effective "pre-Dreadnoughts" are getting groggy, surely these old ironclads, with their 18-in. armour and 67-ton guns, might render assistance against the remnants of a hostile fleet. "Obsolete" ships have distinguished themselves in war before now. We are apt to regard progress in naval matters as more rapid than it really is, and consequently to forget that numbers count for something.

The decision to transfer the Fifth Destroyer Flotilla from Devonport to Harwich marks a fresh step in the depletion of the great naval arsenals in deference to new ideas respecting fleet distribution. Thirty-two torpedo craft will be permanently removed from the Hamoaze to the North Sea base early in the new year. The Service view is that this is merely a concession to the agitators who are never so happy as when they can count a few more German than British destroyers in the North Sea. There appears to be some room to doubt the strategic wisdom of withdrawing virtually all the naval defensive forces from the great dockyard ports for concentration along a coast which offers but the vaguest objective to attack. The destruction of Devonport would be worth more to an enemy than the capture of Lowestoft and Felixstowe.

A few months ago observations were made in Truth on the unintelligible selection of the Plymouth Cattewater for the establishment of a great oil-fuel depot, the principal objection to it being the insufficient depth of water. This was ridiculed in the customary style by journals which had not made the discovery for themselves. However, the King's Harbour Master for Plymouth Sound has issued a notice to mariners, the purport of which is that for the next three months extensive and costly dredging and blasting operations will be carried out in front of the Admiralty oil fuel wharf at Turnchapel. I may add that as the River Plym possesses a great capacity for silting, this endeavour to rectify a blunder is not likely to prove of much value.

The Admiralty have at last awakened to the fact that dockyard auctions are run by a ring whose concerted plan it is to keep values below scrap prices. Following upon a long pause, marking a final bid of £1,950 for the tug Perseverance at a Devonport sale last week, the "knackers" were considerably astonished when a quiet-looking stranger announced that he would buy in the vessel on behalf of the Admiralty. I understand that this withdrawal of a pretty little bargain is unprecedented and has caused mild consternation in the prosperous clique familiarly known as "The Forties."

"Grievance committees" are the last novelty in dockyard organisation. The purpose of them, however, is the reverse of what is suggested by the name. Such an immense stream of petitions is annually poured in upon the Admiralty of dockyard workers that the task of giving adequate attention to those is a very heavy one. In many instances it would be practicable to combine individual petitions into collective representations. This is the object of the "Grievance Committees." Workmen will submit their cases, which naturally have a good deal in common, and the committees will embody these in the fewest number of petitions. This arrangement is likely to be to the advantage of the staff of the Director of Dockyards equally with the men.

Ocean Island, one of the Gilbert and Ellice group, is a remote fragment of the British Empire in the Pacific, from which news but rarely percolates to the outer world. Some ten years ago the Colonial Office made an astonishing arrangement whereby the guano phosphate deposits of this island, which are worth many millions sterling, were handed over to the Pacific Phosphate Company, Limited (then called the Pacific Islands Company), in return for an annual rent of £50 for four years and a royalty of sixpence a ton subsequently. The company's capital is nominally £500,000, but nine-tenths of this is what is known in financial circles as "water." With an actual cash capital of £50,000, its profits in the first four years amounted to £90,000; in 1907 it made upwards of £140,000, and in 1908 that figure was more than doubled. Very good business for the company, but what about the native owners of the island? On that point I have received a communication which certainly does not bear out the rosy-coloured report issued by the Colonial Office early in the present year.

One gathered from the report that, thanks to the considerate and generous management of the company and the benign sway of the representative of the Colonial Office, the lot of the natives on Ocean Island was almost paradisaical. But I am assured that the natives themselves tell quite another story, and for the guidance of Lord Crewe I will mention a few points on which he might make inquiries. He might find out (1) whether this year between 500 and 600 tons of phosphate were taken out of a piece of land over which the company had no existing right, and whether the native owners' claim to redress has been settled; (2) whether the company and the new Resident Commissioner have put pressure upon natives who have declined to sell or lease their lands; (3) whether forced labour for the Government without the pay or food formerly allowed has been imposed upon the natives; (4) whether the natives have been ordered to move from the Uma main village in order to make way for the company, and whether in consequence of the resistance which is being offered to the extension of the company's operations it is proposed that a large tract of country shall be proclaimed as a "mining area."

---

In order that no injustice may be done to other Colonial Secretaries it is desirable to add that it was in the time of Mr. Chamberlain that this Ocean Island concession was granted. Being before everything else a business man—so his admirers always say—Mr. Chamberlain accepted the company's own estimate of the value of the phosphate as 10s. a ton. A Colonial Secretary with no pretensions to being a business man would probably have ascertained that phosphate from this island fetches anything from 48s. to 65s. a ton.

ODE ON A STRAW HAT.

(After the Manner of Wordsworth's "Lucy.")

Three months ago or even more
The aged bowler hat I wore
  Was mingled with its dust;
Then said I: "This straw hat I'll take;
He shall be mine, and he shall make
  A headpiece for my crust.

"Myself will to my strawyard be
A kindly owner, nor shall he Get softened in the brim;
I in the wet shall now refrain
From strolling, lest the gentle rain
  Prove one too much for him.

"He shall be sported in the sun
(Provided we are given one)
  By lake and lawn and fell;
He (if the beggar only knew't!)
Shall match the tasty summer suit
  Here on this happy swell."

Thus nature spoke (the sort inside):
How soon events dispersed my pride
  In that clean summer hat!
Within a month his youth was gone.
The sequel! wait, and we'll get on
  In half a mo' to that——

I a new bowler now instead
Have placed upon my homely head;
  While he, my joy, my care,
Is but a memory to my Muse,
A straw I once would love to use,
  But nevermore can wear!

That corruption has not yet been wholly stamped out in connection with London Poor-law administration is somewhat suggested by an incident which occurred last week at the meeting of the St. George's-in-the-East Board of Guardians. The appointment of an architect was on the agenda, and the first candidate to be interviewed stated that a proposal had been made to him on behalf of certain of the guardians which he had refused to entertain. The Board thereupon decided to discuss the matter in committee, and deferred making any appointment. One knows so well what is likely to happen when scandals of this kind are discussed in committee that it is to be hoped the President of the Local Government Board will set one of his inspectors to work to ferret out the whole of the facts.

The Bangor and Beaumaris Board of Guardians have had a very similar experience to that of the Ruthin Board, referred to recently in Truth. For years they have been discussing the building of a new workhouse infirmary to take the place of the present building which has been denounced in most drastic terms. The question has been again exhaustively discussed, and a proposal to defer its consideration for another six months was put forward with every likelihood of being accepted. But an inspector of the Local Government Board was present, and he quietly intimated that the patience of his Board was exhausted, and that unless something was done promptly the Guardians would be ordered to close the present buildings. The intimation had the desired effect, and in a few minutes they managed to arrive at the necessary decision. The members of some public bodies might feel ashamed at being forced to perform their duties, but there are no blushes on Bumble's cheeks.

The sort of atrocity of which Bumble and Shallow working hand-in-hand are capable was well illustrated at Plymouth last week. The Guardians prosecuted a domestic servant of twenty-one for deserting her illegitimate child. The baby had been left in charge of a Plymouth woman while the mother went under the care of a labour-exchange officer to a situation at Penzance, and eventually the woman took the child to the workhouse as she had received no money for its support. The reason for the money not being sent was fully explained. Out of her first month's wages the girl had to refund to the labour exchange her railway fare to Penzance. She did not remain at Penzance, but secured another situation at Paignton, and she had to pay her fare to that place. In her new situation she injured her arm after a week, and could earn nothing, though some kind Samaritan had provided her with a home. Then Bumble took out a warrant for her arrest, and Shallow sent her to prison for a month.

This was not all. Captain Inskip, the chairman of the bench, described the girl's conduct as "un-Christian and uncharitable." Yet the chief constable had informed the bench that for some years she had been an orphan, and had to fight the battle of life single-handed, and a representative of the Salvation Army was prepared to take charge of the child and see that the mother had another chance. Really her only chance is to secure employment, and what that chance is likely to be worth with the brand of gaol upon her needs not to be insisted upon, except to magistrates who prate about virtues of which they obviously have not the slightest conception. Steps have been taken to bring the case before the Home Secretary, and it is to be hoped that his prompt action will give the Plymouth magistrates a much-needed lesson in common humanity.

One can anticipate some such result with the more confidence since Mr. Churchill has recently been showing commendable activity in setting right the vagaries of the great unpaid. Last week he gave the game-preservers of the Newmarket bench a well-deserved snub. They had sentenced a man of sixty-nine to a month's imprisonment without the option of a fine for being on land for the purpose of taking game, though nothing had previously been recorded against him! The Home Secretary asked that the magistrates should be called together and their report forwarded to the Home Office. Immediately on the receipt of the report he wired to the governor of Cambridge Gaol to release the prisoner.

Mr. Churchill's action in this instance is so directly at variance with the charges brought against his administration by Mr. Pickersgill, M.P., in the case to which reference was made in Truth last week that I am not surprised to find his lengthy reply in the Daily News puts a very different complexion on the case. The gravamen of Mr. Pickersgill's charge was that the Home Secretary had evaded consideration of the case on its merits. From Mr. Churchill's reply it is clear that he gave his careful personal consideration to the facts. He may have come to a wrong decision upon them, and personally I think that Mr. Pickersgill made out a strong case for the release of the lad in whose case he had taken an interest. But that did not justify Mr. Pickersgill in charging the Home Secretary with failure to give due consideration to the case, particularly when there was in his possession correspondence which clearly showed that such consideration had been given.

Some of my readers may remember the case of a London street beggar whose career was cut short a few years ago at the City of London Sessions, where it was shown that he lived in a sumptuously furnished house in the suburbs and came up to business every day to pose in the streets as a paralytic match-seller. After his conviction he went to Cambridge, where he represented himself as an undergraduate of Trinity and a nephew of Dr. Clifford. These representations obtained for him another term of imprisonment. After this he went to Scotland as a Protestant lecturer, represented himself as a Wesleyan minister, and ultimately started a mission on his own account. The result has been that last week he was placed in the dock at Ayr under the name of the Rev. Thomas Henry Clifford to answer a rich variety of charges, ranging from bigamy to forgery. The Sheriff sentenced him to eighteen months' hard labour after remarking that the case was one of the worst that ever came before him. What seems to me most worthy of remark about the case is the fact that it is yet another instance of the way in which the rabid no-popery party are victimised by criminal impostors. What with the Widdowses and the Cliffords the Scottish Protestants seem particularly unhappy in their choice of champions.

I regret that I did an injustice to Mr. Justice Horridge in last week's reference to the new judicial appointments, where it was observed that none of the new judges has ever sat in the House of Commons. Mr. Justice Horridge, of course, not only sat in the last Parliament, but got there by a conspicuous electioneering performance, having defeated Mr. Balfour in Manchester.

A correspondent brings to my notice a case of cruelty to a dog heard at Bromley police court. A man had been instructed to destroy a whippet, and he endeavoured to do so by knocking it on the head with a hammer. He seems to have felt some qualms at the result of his amateur efforts, for he swooned before he killed the unfortunate beast, which had to be sent to a chemist to be put out of its misery. The magistrates merely fined him 5s. and costs, and this my correspondent thinks a totally inadequate punishment. Under ordinary circumstances I should have agreed with him, but in this instance the evidence of lack of intention to inflict suffering was so clear from the effect of his action on the man himself that the magistrates can scarcely be blamed for imposing a nominal penalty.

A curious anomaly of the Poor-law was revealed in a case heard last week in the Liverpool Police Court. A man was charged with neglecting to maintain his wife and children. It appeared that he had been in hospital for a considerable time, and had to undergo an operation which left him incapable of earning enough to keep his home going. If the family went into the workhouse the home would have to be broken up. On the other hand, the imposition of a term of imprisonment on the man would enable the Poor-law authorities to grant out-relief to the family and so keep the home together. This may be the letter of the law, but the Poor-law authorities are hardly to be congratulated for adhering to it so strictly. The Local Government Board auditor would not be likely to surcharge the guardians with the out-relief expended in such a case, and to send a man to prison for failure to do something he is manifestly incapable of doing is rank injustice.

Rightly holding that it is farcical to attempt to suppress an offence by means of pecuniary penalties which still leave a huge gain to the offenders, Mr. Cluer sentenced two Austrians to ten weeks' imprisonment for a breach of the Lottery Acts. Against these sentences they appealed to the County of London Sessions on Friday. Their counsel quite superfluously explained that their object in coming over here to distribute Hungarian lottery circulars was to save the difference of three-halfpence between foreign and inland postage. Of course it was, and as the defendants were sending out 200,000 circulars the saving amounted to between £600 and £700. Yet the Justices at the Sessions were so impressed by this remarkable plea that they actually substituted fines of £25 each and costs for the sentences inflicted by Mr. Cluer. A grosser exhibition of judicial imbecility has rarely been seen, nor was it mended by the "public warning that a similar course would not be adopted in any future case." Similar warnings have been uttered for years past in precisely similar cases.

As I bestowed so much attention upon the Mint Co-operative Club, Limited, at its birth, I ought not to allow its burial to go unnoticed. The Official Receiver has recently performed the last rite by obtaining his release as liquidator of the company. His final statement shows that the directors estimated that the assets would produce £25,445 10s. 6d. Absolutely the only amount recovered by the liquidator was two shillings and sixpence, the value of unused stamps! Even the £20 odd represented as "cash at bankers" and "cash in hand" never materialised. As a matter of fact, all the assets of this company were illegally transferred to a concern styled the Mint Publishing Co., Limited, which after further raids on the pockets of unwary investors was allowed to extinguish itself by voluntary winding up. The story of these companies is a scandal which under any efficient system of administering the law would have resulted in the prosecution of the harpies who promoted them.

The famous tipster Pizzey was in his finest form at Newmarket last week. Here are the telegrams which he sent out from day to day:—

Sherboro, extra special.
Miss Keen, extra special; Pure Gem, Elizabetta, win and place.
Killin, extra special, well tried, will win.
Red Star, extra special; also Privation considered certainty. Help yourself to-day.

My sporting readers will not need to be told that all these animals figured among the "also rans." Immediately before this Pizzey had given five similar predictions, so that he secured altogether a sequence of a dozen beaten and unplaced horses. Not everybody could do that—the odds are that if you or I attempted the feat we should blunder upon at least one winner—but it comes quite easy to this gifted prophet.

Beston's latest is distinctly humorous. In connection with one of his publications called Lloyd's Mid-Week Special he has issued a circular announcing that as "a new feature in our business" it is proposed "to assist backers to collect accounts from defaulting bookmakers." Despite the old adage, I scarcely think it would be prudent to set a welsher to catch a welsher, and that is what Beston—of course, under various disguises—has been. But the innocents who are caught by such circulars do not know this, nor are they aware that the swarm of tipsters' advertisements inserted in the Special, in such names as "Frank Curtin," "Miss Dora Lilian Charlesworth," "Dan Bruce," "George Leslie," etc., all emanate from the same Protean rascal, while "Mr. George H. Warwick" appears to be a new bookmaking alias.

Years ago one Barnett, alias "S. Bassett," of 285, Oxford Street, frequently came under my notice as a money-lending harpy whose trap was specially baited for medical men. He has dropped out of sight for the last two or three years, but I find that he is now on the war-path once more. This time he is turning his attention to ladies, for whose benefit he has got out a new circular, in which he talks of his great experience "in financing ladies of independent means and assisting them over temporary difficulties." The methods of "financing" adopted by such usurers as Barnett are well known, and ladies who do not wish their temporary difficulties to be seriously aggravated should give this individual a wide berth.

One moneylending tout who impudently adopts the honoured name of Coutts as an alias (his patronymic being plain Jones) already figures in my Cautionary List, and two more will keep him company in the next edition. They call themselves "E. and F. Coutts," 108, Jermyn Street, S.W. One of the partners is Edward Huggins, of 7, Jerningham Road, New Cross, and the other Francis Byron Fearns, of 50, Loampit Hill, Lewisham, who years ago traded as "Frank Lea" and subsequently as "H. J. Anderson." The Act of 1900 was expressly designed to put a stop to this assumption of misleading aliases, but thanks to the inactivity of the authorities responsible for its administration it has become a dead letter.

On this subject Mr. Justice Darling has just made some forcible remarks. Abraham Cohen, the extortioner who poses as "L. Fortescue, Limited," sued a borrower for interest at the rate of over 100 per cent. In cutting down this charge to the 25 per cent. which the defendant had already paid into court, his lordship expressed the opinion that it was entirely contrary to the intention of the Legislature that persons such as Cohen should be allowed to register themselves and carry on their business in the names of well-known families such as Fortescue. He added that he hoped the law would be altered to compel every moneylender to trade in his real name. Even as it stands, however, the law would effect this purpose in nine cases out of ten if only it were properly administered; but as the House of Lords pointed out in a judgment some months ago, this part of the Act of 1900 never has been properly administered.

Of course, the touts do not always think it necessary to mask their real names. For instance, "Mr. A. E. Wheatley," whose circulars are sent out from 26, Charles Street, S.W., is really Albert Edward Wheatley, of 43, Burlington Avenue, Kew Gardens. He is very obliging. In order to "arrange advances from £50 to £5,000," he "will visit intending clients, if necessary, incurring no expense to the latter, whatever the distance." Philanthropists of this species are becoming more philanthropic every day.

Last week I mentioned that "T. Langton, Esq.," the moneylenders' tout who advertises himself as a "Rugby and Oxford (Merton College and Bullingdon Club) man," was never a member of the Bullingdon. It has now been definitely ascertained that his statement as to Merton College is equally untrue; and if the Public Prosecutor did his duty this impostor, whose real name is probably Field, would be prosecuted under Section 4 of the Moneylenders Act.

I do not know whether the Bath waters, in addition to their medicinal qualities, have the effect of filling the visitor with the virtue of charity. There seems to be some idea of the kind, however, judging from a visitor's account of the remarkable facilities Bath gives for the exercise of this virtue. He refers particularly to the soliciting of subscriptions in the streets and in the shops. Tradesmen's counters are littered with collecting-boxes, some of them bearing the names of deserving charities, local or national, but others belonging to disreputable agencies whose appeals are an imposition upon the public. For example, Bath is a happy hunting ground of George Breton's Poor Children's Society. He is astute enough, it appears, to dispense some of his "free meals" in the city, and he thereby secures very cheaply the support of the guileless shopkeepers and their customers, who never think of inquiring whether it is a properly managed society and what proportion of its income is absorbed in official salaries, commissions, and other expenses. For the sake of their own funds it is a pity the managers of the respectable local charities do not take steps to prevent the diversion of money to concerns of the Breton type, about which information can be obtained from the TRUTH Cautionary List or the Charity Organisation Society.

In regard to street collections at Bath, my correspondent refers specially to a recent carnival of cadging by school children on behalf of the Seamen and Boatmen's Friend Society. The society has before now been criticised in TRUTH for employing children in this way. At Bath a swarm of children were out with boxes at all hours, day after day, and inquiry showed that they got the boxes from the masters and mistresses of the local elementary schools. They were not, however, persuaded to go begging as a practical lesson of the Squeers sort in charitable work, but were incited to do so by the promise of rewards in the shape of watches and chains for those who collected the largest amounts. I hope that this matter will receive the prompt attention of the Bath Education Committee. These schoolmasters and mistresses should be sharply reminded that it is an abominable thing under any circumstances to teach children to be beggars, and doubly abominable to encourage them to beg for the sake of their own personal gain.

No. 98 in Truth Cautionary List, Mrs. C. C. Rossiter, of 7, Westminster Palace Gardens, S.W., has returned to the begging-letter line of business. This time the protégée for whom she appeals is the young daughter of a clergyman suffering from a mental breakdown, who only needs a few months' proper care to be permanently cured. I have in my possession two of these appeals. One is dated July 16, the other October 8, but they are word for word the same and are evidently a stock form. This should alone be sufficient to prevent response to them, but an additional reason is to be found in the fact that with Mrs. Rossiter begging is a regular part of her business, for she charges her clients a commission on the cash which she manages to collect for them.

A correspondent sends me an account of an experience of advertised bargains in furs similar to that referred to last week in Truth. In this instance the advertiser was not a lady of title, but Davis and Co., of Denmark Hill. The fur purported to be Russian sable, but my correspondent describes it as "scarcely mangy cat." Since the fur was sent on approval no harm was done, but, in nine cases out of ten, the women who answer these advertisements are quite incapable of distinguishing between sable and cat, and the misdescription of the advertisement is very likely to deceive them. Similarly, Davis and Co.'s description of themselves as "pawnbrokers" is also calculated to deceive the unwary into a belief that they are obtaining a bargain, the fact being that the firm deals entirely in new shoddy goods and does not possess the necessary certificate to enable it to carry on a pawnbroker's business. There must be a considerable number of people who are deceived, for Davis and Co. have been large advertisers for years past, and they would scarcely continue to advertise unless they found it pay.

One of the busiest of the fortune-telling humbugs is "Professor" Roxroy, of 177A, Kensington High Street (No. 681 Truth Cautionary List). He has recently been informing ladies in America that after a recent examination of their "Zodiacal indications" he has come across some matters which he believes they would like to be advised upon, and he offers to send them his advice in the form of an "annual reading" for 8s. From my examination of the professor's "Zodiacal indications," I have come to the conclusion that we owe his presence in London to the fact that his business, if carried on in the U.S.A., would in all probability come within the scope of a post office fraud order, and that he is not unconnected with that Yankee flat-trap called the Psycho Success Club. My reading of these indications is that anyone who sends the Professor 8s. will provide an admirable illustration of the proverbial relationship between a fool and his money.

Another charlatan of the same type is Zazra, of 90, New Bond Street. Zazra is either more greedy than Roxroy, or he has more impudence, for he asks £5 5s. from his dupes for a "Terrestrialscope," though if they do not at once forward the cash they will find the magician will make a sweeping reduction to one half the original price. The Terrestrialscope is an all-embracing document. It will reveal to you the finer shades of your nature and tell you how to avoid trouble from your little intrigues; inform you where to invest your money and how to avoid indigestion; provide you with a psychical recipe for longevity, and warn you of any danger you may be in of making an appearance in the Divorce Court. Laughable though such pretensions are, it is easy to see that in certain cases predictions on these matters may have very mischievous results. It is true that the women who consult the Zazras and Roxroys are own sisters to the silly servant girls who cross the gipsy's hand at the area gate with a piece of silver. But the police take cognisance of the gipsy's law-breaking, and I really do not see why the rogues and vagabonds of Bond Street should be allowed to escape.

A firm calling itself Plant and Co., of 412, Stockport Road, Manchester, has lately been advertising home employment by which from £3 to £4 a week may be earned. The work offered is incandescent mantle making, and the terms are identical with those of the London Incandescent Company, of East Dulwich (No. 528 Truth Cautionary List), an essential condition being the deposit of 5s. 6d. for a licence, formula, and working plan. It should be pretty obvious that any employment which offers an opportunity of earning £4 a week would not need to advertise for employees, but if any further proof were needed that the advertisement is only a trap for obtaining preliminary fees, it is provided in a correspondence which has been forwarded to me.

In this case the would-be employee asked for a reference from some one working for Plant and Co., and also offered to deposit the preliminary fee with the Exchange and Mart, and to liberate the money as soon as he was satisfied with the bona fides of the business. To the first request Plant and Co. made the lame reply that they did not publish the names and addresses of their workers lest they should be dismissed from other jobs if their employers knew they were doing extra work at home; and to the second suggestion they replied that they did not submit a private process on an approval system, which was all right for any one who wanted to exchange some white mice for an old frock coat, but could not be acceded to by an old business house of some commercial standing. The name of this old business house of some commercial standing is not, as it happens, to be found in the Manchester directory, while the envelopes in which its correspondence is enclosed bear the East Dulwich post-mark. Under these circumstances the name of Plant and Co. seems a curiously happy selection.

Further information concerning the work which the National Association of Goldsmiths is doing in protecting servant girls against the tallymen who foist on them shoddy jewellery at exorbitant prices is contained in the secretary's current monthly report. One of the cases dealt with by the Association last month was in regard to a firm named Hartley and Co., 39, Halford Road, Fulham, whose tout had bullied two maidservants in the neighbourhood of Birmingham into ordering gold watches. Inquiries revealed the fact that Hartley and Co. was the nom de guerre of a man named Lane, who is the manager for Hamilton's, Limited, of 41, Gracechurch Street, E.C. (No. 587 Truth Cautionary List), a firm which has also traded from the same address under the name of "Normans, Limited." It is well that someone should make it his business to keep his eye on these gentry, for, as a rule, they have as many aliases as a cat has lives.

On several occasions during the past eighteen months references have appeared in Truth to the "Provident" Legal Accident Society, of 108, Marylebone Road, the most recent having been on September 28 in relation to the offering for sale of "family tickets" which entitle the holder, his wife, and family to free legal advice for a year. My comments have led the manager, and I suppose I may also call him proprietor, of the society, Mr. Leslie, to communicate with me in the hope that I might be led to modify my opinion in regard to the legal aid business in general and this society in particular. So far as Mr. Leslie's own society is concerned, my criticisms have been mainly directed to his methods of obtaining business, for I have no reason to doubt that what business he does obtain is conducted on straightforward lines. I do not like his method of selling tickets of membership at a penny or sixpence a time, for it is obvious that the fee paid is merely a means of getting the public to pay for the advertising of the concern. The fees in any case are too trivial to be of any financial value to the business, and they merely serve to support a number of more or less out-at-elbows touts.

As regards the general question of the desirability of legal aid societies I have always admitted that they may very well perform a useful function. There is, in fact, very much the same necessity for the legal as for the medical dispensary. In many, if not in most, legal matters the working man is undoubtedly at a disadvantage in dealing with his landlord or his employer, and a society which would supply him with advice and assistance when the occasion arose would have strong claims to support. But to command confidence such societies must not be the private enterprises of individuals. As cases dealt with from time to time in Truth have made clear, the legal aid society is too often nothing more than the stalking horse for Messrs. Dodson and Fogg. Mr. Leslie's society is not a "tied house" in this respect, but the unqualified legal practitioner is as much a danger to the litigant as the unqualified medical practitioner to his patient. His existence is due undoubtedly to the demand for the services which he undertakes to render, and this being the case it is a pity that the trade unions and other representative bodies do not take steps to provide the necessary machinery to make the private legal aid society unnecessary.

---

I presume that the following advertisement, culled from the Glasgow Herald, is an example of Scottish humour. Apparently the two ladies are indulging in a gibe at the expense of the landlords who have been crying out at the difficulty of filling up Form 4, and have taken their own means of showing that the labour is to be looked upon as a mere light holiday diversion:—

Wanted.—Two ladies in country require the services of young lawyer. K.C. preferred, to fill Lloyd George's papers; fortnight's board residence offered in return; references required.

When I last referred to Mr. Ashley Larkins' ingenious dodge for advertising his latest work I had not had an opportunity of forming an opinion as to the merits or otherwise of "England's Government of Her Dependencies." A correspondent, who has paid 5s. for the volume, with a view to trying his hand at a review and so qualifying for an appointment as Mr. Larkins' secretary, has enabled me to remedy the omission. A perusal of the book was quite sufficient to banish from my correspondent's mind any desire to enter Mr. Larkins' service, and this, I take it, is the only conclusion at which any one of normal intelligence could possibly arrive.

What, however, a reviewer really can do with Mr. Ashley Larkins is shown in a translation of a review which purports to have appeared in a publication called the French Journal of Art and Literature, and which Mr. Larkins sends out to competitors for the honour of serving him. According to this, the author, "with truer genius" than Boswell, who only made Johnson great, "has made England by his work greater than England really is; yet he has done so with a grandness of manner which covers him all over with dignity . . . yet from the home of the great mind that produced it we hear only occasional and reluctant praise." With a reviewer like this in the running there is evidently no chance for a mere Englishman who, as one of Mr. Larkins' own countrymen once expressed himself, can only "praise with faint damns."

---

The book has, however, one point of interest. This is a preface containing an account of the author's life from the pen of A. L. Hants. As "Hants" is Mr. Larkins in his capacity of publisher it will be gathered that the "life" is autobiographical, and as such it really ought to have been complete. Thus, for instance, while it is recorded that as a law student at Gray's Inn "he dined with King Edward once, the Duke of Connaught twice, and Prince George of Wales twice" there is an omission to mention the fact that the Benchers refused to call him to the bar. There is also mention of a "brilliant speech" delivered by Mr. Larkins in "Moses's room in the House of Lords" in "the great action of Miss Pestle Grimes v. Comiskey," the which "signal service thus rendered by Mr. Larkins to His Majesty and the State has led to great results," though what these are remains undisclosed. Similarly, while mentioning the foundation of "Mr. Larkins's Unemployed Scheme" there is no account of what has become of the money collected for it. Nor is there any reference to the frequent allusions to Mr. Larkins which have appeared in these columns. Really one would have expected Mr. Hants to have been better acquainted with the life of his alter ego Mr. Larkins.

There is an Indian magazine called The Kalpaka which is, I am told, devoted to the tenets of what is known as Higher Thought. I have not seen the magazine, but I have received some copies of a "supplement" in the form of a circular, from which it appears that the propagation of the Higher Thought is combined with the promotion of a flat-catching scheme. The circular bears the name of Dartnell and Co., "dealers in bonds and lotteries," Pondicherry, who offer for subscription 1,000 shares of five rupees, each in what is described as a "confederacy group" for the purchase of one hundred premium bonds. Dartnell's English is perplexingly Babuish, but so far as I can make out any prize or prizes won by the bonds during a period of twelve months will be divided among the members of the "confederacy," and at the end of that period the bonds themselves will be distributed by means of a raffle. Ninety per cent. of the bonds selected are of the trashiest class, and their aggregate value is vastly less than the amount the subscribers are asked to provide. On the evidence before me the Higher Thought must be hopelessly in conflict with common sense.

THE END OF THE SEASON.

Now, knowing that peace has descended at last
On the average oceanside town,
Surcharged with elation,
I haste to the station,
And by the first train travel down.
I'm sure to be welcomed and treated right well
As the sole lordly guest at the Royal Hotel;
The waiters will scramble to answer the bell,
And tremble with fear at my frown.

The bathing machines which disfigured the beach
Have been trundled away out of sight;
The niggers and pierrots
(The summer girls' heroes)
Abandoned their "pitches" last night.
Long ranks of deck chairs, sadly faded and frayed,
No longer encumber the pier and parade;
The band on the front its last programme has brayed,
And Londonwards taken its flight.

Bath chairs in procession have ceased to pass by,
Endangering visitors' toes;
The vendor of ices
No longer entices
The children to stomachic woes.
No steamboat arrives at the pier, to the roar
Of "Hurry up, please! Any more for the shore?"
Bronzed skippers of sailing yachts cease to implore
One to sail by the "Thistle" or "Rose."

Oh! give me the calm which the season knows not,
When all but the ocean is dumb;
For seaside attractions
And trippers' strange actions
But render me hopelessly glum.
I therefore have made it my custom to stay
In town when the mass of the folk are away,
Postponing my annual brief holiday
Till the end of the season has come.

SCRUTATOR.

WESTERN MEN AND EASTERN MORALS.

WHEN the articles on the above subject appeared in Truth a few weeks ago I anticipated that as soon as they got out to the East I should hear a good deal from readers in that part of the world. The result has exceeded my anticipations. For two or three weeks past every mail has brought me its budget of letters on "Western Men and Eastern Morals," and as I have thought it best to let them accumulate with a view to dealing with them in gross rather than in detail, I am now confronted with a pile of correspondence of rather appalling magnitude. However, the task of discussing it is somewhat simplified by the fact that the writers think very much alike, and mostly in two opposite directions. It is possible, therefore, to select a few typical letters which will quite sufficiently indicate the drift of opinion and feeling on this subject among men on the spot; and though most of the writers, especially when moved by a contradictory spirit, demand the publication of their epistles as a matter of right or "common fairness," I must ask them to recognise that no good purpose is to be served by printing a number of letters which merely say the same thing in different words.

The men who have delivered their minds on this subject may be divided into three groups:—(1) Those who either deny that concubinage prevails to any considerable extent in Burma and the adjoining countries or pooh-pooh it as the mere correlative of the irregular relations of men and women which exist in England; (2) those who admit that the state of the case is more or less as it was described in Truth, but justify it as inevitable under local conditions, or even a salutary and desirable arrangement; (3) those who admit it and deplore it as a moral and social evil. There was precisely the same division of opinion in the correspondence which came from people at home when the articles first appeared. I may, therefore, observe again here, as I did then, that the second and third groups of correspondents practically dispose of the first, and I see no object in publishing denials from men in the East that a certain state of things exists when numbers of other men are writing to justify this very state of things. For example, one gentleman writes:—

> You have been entirely misinformed. Writing with twenty years' experience I can confidently say I have not heard of twenty Europeans living with native women. There is no doubt that in isolated and remote districts some do take concubines, but even among such men it is not common. . . .

On the top of this comes the following:—

> Why don't you tackle the rich men who keep mistresses at home instead of us poor devils in the jungle? I live for nine months in the year by myself in the jungle, and never see a white man. Who is going to look after me and nurse me when I have fever? . . . . You ought to realise the conditions of life in Burma before you publish such articles. Burma is not a white woman's country. Half-caste children are generally brought up as Burmans, and are not in the least like Eurasians. . . . . Girls who have lived with a European are much sought after by Burmans.

Here is every point in the first Truth article on Burma frankly admitted, except that the writer does not consider the women and children to be objects for sympathy. I will come to that point again later. Meantime, it is manifestly absurd to tell me that I have been "misled" and "misinformed" when "the man on the spot" writes in this strain.

I make an exception, however, in the case of Assam. It may be remembered that Assam did not figure in the first Truth article on this question. It was introduced subsequently by a correspondent who made a number of imputations against the management of the Indian tea estates, concubinage and its attendant evils being only one of the counts of his indictment. His allegations were categorically denied by Mr. Ranald Davidson, and there I had to leave the matter. But I have now had a number of letters from Assam which require notice in fairness to the planting industry. One writer says:—

> I have read what your correspondent says with regard to the mode of life prevailing amongst tea planters in Assam and your comments on the same, which would be quite justifiable had your correspondent's statements been true. As a planter of seventeen years' experience I have no hesitation in saying that his letter gives an entirely false and misleading view of tea planters and the life they lead, and one calculated to give much uncalled-for pain and anxiety to parents and friends at home, who are unaware of the true facts of the case. I do not for one moment say that concubinage does not exist, but when it does it is carried on surreptitiously, is not common, and, most emphatically, not as your correspondent states managers acting as pimps for their assistants, handing over to their assistants their discarded mistresses, etc.—in other words, living a degraded and most revolting life. This is a disgraceful libel on a hard-working community. . . .

The letter proceeds to discuss in detail all the allegations of my previous correspondent, but as there is enough of it to fill a column or two of TRUTH I cannot possibly reproduce more. So far as Assam is concerned, I think the justice of the case will be sufficiently met by giving the following letter from an officer of the Indian Army, who is, in the first place, a disinterested observer, unconnected with the tea industry, and, over and above that, writes in a reasonable and temperate spirit which inspires confidence:—

I have read your article of August 31 ("Shady Side of Assam") with great interest. Your correspondent makes certain statements, which, though I cannot absolutely contradict them, are such that I should like to give my opinion on them. For two years (1907-1908) I served with my regiment in Dibrugarh, and my experience, gained from what I myself saw, and from common knowledge and gossip, does not quite substantiate your correspondent's facts and allegations.

As a youngster, I congratulated myself on being on intimate terms with that most charming person, the young planter, and I think I may fairly say that I was admitted to his inmost thoughts. As an observer of his life, I came to this conclusion, that, as long as the planter was within reach of a club, his social life accorded with that of any other young Englishman, be he soldier, Indian civilian, policeman, or anything else. Outside the twelve-mile radius of the clubs (i.e., civilisation) the temptation to lax morals (as understood by your correspondent) was too great for any healthy young man to withstand. One hears the man who is lucky enough to be within reach of civilisation saying that the outlying planters are good for nothing but novels and black women, but I am certain that the whole scandal is merely a matter of circumstance and environment. Any man who has to live a lonely life is entitled to such comforts as he can obtain, and I think that a planter who may have started a career of "vice" in the jungle, when he is transferred to civilisation, i.e., Dibrugarh, Dun Duma, or similar places, will at once become as moral a member of society as could be desired.

As regards the statement that twenty bachelor planters do not exist who do not indulge in concubinage, I would take up the challenge with pleasure should your correspondent still stick to the statement.

So much for Assam. We will now return to Burma, and to the correspondents who speak more or less apologetically on behalf of the conditions of life which undoubtedly prevail. I think the following letter may be taken as fairly representative. The writer is evidently a man of wide experience and average morality. He does not regard the concubine system with undue admiration, and the excuses which he offers are practically those which everybody else offers:—

I have been in the East for twenty-five years, and can speak from experience as I have been in Burma, Siam, Federated Malay States, Sumatra, Java, Borneo, China, also Australia, the whole of Europe, including Russia. To put the subject in a nutshell: The modern white woman is not a blessing to the enterprising man or the planter out East, unless the man has money safe and sound; then marry. The European woman will never adapt herself to the local condition of things. Being a white woman she must keep up her position. That means servants and expenses and trouble which make a bachelor tremble to think of, especially in a place like Singapore. The wife cannot control the servants, and it follows that the husband cannot control his expenses. The man who wrote letter No. 3 in your paper dated August 24, 1910, has hit the nail on the head. "When we bring up our girls so that they can live a frugal life and be a help and not a hindrance to a poor struggling man in London, or sweating in a Burma jungle, we shall be able to cope with the vice in our own country, and then can purify the morals of the East."

The average pay out here is from 150 dollars upwards. Now a planter gets 125 dollars for a start, and in five years he may be manager, or he may have to start again owing to his estate failing. At present, of course, we have the rubber in full swing, but that also may collapse; so you see, a planter's life is very uncertain, and he is foolish to entertain the idea of marrying a white woman till he has money saved.

Now comes the question, in his loneliness what is he going to do? Personally, I say have "a temporary wife." These matters are nicely managed all over the East. But should he contemplate getting married to a white woman after making his pile he should be very careful to pack his "temporary wife" off, buy her a piece of land, etc., and give a bonus for wear and tear, and say good-bye, as he is going to Europe. He had better see that she is miles away, and not in the same district as the white wife, or else God help the white woman! . . . .

All these troubles can be prevented if the white woman will stoop down, or, I should say, if "society" will allow her to live happily with her husband on a small pay, and, if need be, cook his meals, till such time when he can afford to spend more as his pay increases. Then he will not feel, as he now does, the need of the "temporary wife." Every white man would like to have a white wife, but the over-education of the white woman and her longing for pleasure and dress frightens him off, and he adapts himself to the condition of things in the Jungle. In time he is happy with his animals, vegetable garden, fowls, and perhaps a hobby, so why change? Why should he? An ornamental European woman is a useless, expensive misery. Again, supposing the estate is large, the manager a bachelor, and only one of his assistants married and the wife a pleasant and attractive woman. The husband is favoured by the manager, and in time—well, here you have another danger of married life for a young man on an Eastern plantation. Again, supposing there are two women on the estate. Those two white women will be the biggest enemies and will cause no end of mischief, to the great dissatisfaction of the management. No wonder one sees in advertisements "Wanted—so and so—no married men need apply."

For all those reasons, Mr. Editor, the wisest plan is to let the bachelor keep his "temporary wife" until such time as he has saved enough to support a white woman. But then, again, he must be wise enough to select a woman who will be satisfied with the position he can give her, and as a husband he must be a diplomat at all times.

I could give one or two other letters more or less on the same lines, but in which more stress is laid on the solitude and need of female domestic assistance in the backwoods of Burma, but this was strongly insisted upon by correspondents who replied to my previous article. It seems necessary to mention here that the foregoing letter is written from the Federated Malay States, though the writer speaks from experience of Burma and other countries. I am reluctant to widen the geographical area of this discussion; but in view of the purpose of these articles—namely to enlighten the public at home—it is necessary to do this. When Burma was under notice in the earlier articles, I could not help wondering in my own mind how far the same condition of things prevailed in the regions further south, where the white planter population is expanding so rapidly under the influence of the "rubber boom." Misgivings on that point have since been justified by communications from two gentlemen familiar with the Malayan peninsula, who state that things are much the same there as in Burma. The above letter confirms this evidence, and the facts ought to be known by those who are sending their youngsters to the famous rubber plantations of the "Middle East."

We have now got to what I take to be the crux of the whole question, the difficulties in the way of keeping European wives in this part of the world. The following letter deals with this question from a somewhat different point of view:—

In Scrutator's article on "Western Men and Eastern Morals," August 24, "Ex-Oriente" settles the whole question for us very decisively. From that it is clear that what was stated in TRUTH was not a bit exaggerated, and I, who am on the spot, can only say that you do not yet know enough of this great evil.

"Ex-Oriente" asserts that continence is not possible for the majority of Englishmen in the East, except as a counsel of perfection. This is open to considerable question, but I do not wish to discuss the point. The second and best alternative, according to "Ex-Oriente," is marriage, and marriage to a white woman is not always possible for reasons given by the writer. But does this settle the question as finally as "Ex-Oriente" assumes? If marriage to a white woman is not possible, why not have marriage with a woman of the country, which will do away with the shameful evil of concubinage and its shocking consequences? The last and worst alternative hinted at by "Ex-Oriente" will also be avoided. There is the crux of the question, and the way it has been dealt with only shows the selfishness of Western men, called Christians by courtesy. The Western wants to have his pleasures, but he does not want to pay for them. That is the root of the matter.

How can any Englishman justify the present system of concubinage when the fate of the children of such unions is considered? If you were to inquire at the convents and orphanages in Rangoon and other towns in Burma, you would be shocked to learn the large number of the so-called orphans whose fathers have abandoned them. These fathers have married among their own people. Some have left the country, others without fear or shame live in the same town where these unfortunate children are. There have been, and are, honourable exceptions where the fathers have remained true to their children, and have don all they could for them. But how many have abandoned their children for good the records of the orphanages will show. How can a system which leads to such results be defended? If your exposure does anything to stop this disgraceful evil you will earn the lasting gratitude of these unfortunate children and of all right-minded people.

Rangoon papers fight shy of the question. Not a word is mentioned of what has appeared in TRUTH for three weeks in succession.

The only other letter which I can find room to quote at present touches on the same point as the last, and brings us to one at least of the remedies for the present state of things. I may mention that this letter also is dated from the rubber district of the Malay Peninsula, so do not let it be taken as applying only to companies trading in Burma:—

I have read with great interest the articles, "Western Men and Eastern Morals," in your issues of August 10 and 17.

Burma and Assam are not the only places where morals are not what they might be, but the whole of the Middle East.

It appears to me that the only remedy for the present state of European morals in the East is for the home directors and managers to pay better salaries, and so enable their men to marry before they come East, or soon after they arrive.

The most wretched sight I know is to see the man who has bastard children, damned for life, his whole time taken up wondering what is to become of his children. A boy child at best can only be despised by his mother's race and loathed by his father's people. Of a girl child there is only one end—to follow in her mother's steps.

If only companies would encourage their European employees to marry instead of discouraging them, they would not only benefit themselves, but raise the standard of morality, and save hundreds of men from a lifetime's damnation.

Both the man who keeps a concubine and the married man are in perpetual fear lest the white women of the community in which they live should find out the true state of things. I ask is it fair that married men should be put in this position because directors of companies won't pay better salaries and increase their moral responsibilities by allowing their employees to marry?

But the most wretched and most deplorable of all is the married man with a wife and family at home who keeps a native concubine, and there are many such cases.

I should like you to publish this, so that people at home may know the true state of things, and, knowing it, may try to improve the elasticity of European morals in the East by inducing shareholders and directors to see that every facility is given to men here to marry. That is the one and only way in which the morals of the East will change.

I have now done my best to digest within reasonable limits all that the men on the spot have found to say on this subject. In my collections there are numerous letters dealing with side issues, letters also from other parts of the world dealing with local conditions. These must stand aside, at any rate for the present.

We come back, with the last letter quoted above, to the point at which the whole of this discussion started in TRUTH of August 10—the attitude of firms who have large establishments in the East towards the marriage of their European employees. The voluminous letters that have been written to TRUTH on the subject by something like a hundred people interested in this subject put no different complexion upon the facts originally stated, unless by showing that the evil is more widely and firmly established than the first remarks upon it suggested. There is certainly no longer any room for question or doubt about the facts. As I said at first and have several times repeated, the habits and morals of our fellow-countrymen dwelling in tropical or Oriental countries are, in a general way, no concern of mine or of the public at home. But to this general proposition there are in this instance two exceptions. In the first place, when boys fresh from school are going out in large numbers from England to Burma and the adjacent countries, the habits and morals prevailing in the society which they are going to join are a matter of very serious concern to those at home who are responsible for their welfare. That is the first and chief reason why attention has been called in TRUTH to this unpleasant subject. Secondly, the matter is one of more than local concern, because it affects the credit of the British name in the eyes of the natives we rule and in the eyes of foreigners who may sit in judgment upon us, that one of the results of British rule and British influence in semi-barbarous countries should be the creation of a large population of wretched, fatherless, half-caste children. I say nothing of the degradation of the native women, because the apologists of the system deny that the women are degraded—even assert, as may be seen above, that their social status is elevated by the honour conferred upon them. Granting that the consequences to the women are a debateable point, there is no room for two opinions about the condition of the children.

The prevailing state of things is, therefore, an evil from at least two points of view. A man need not be a puritan or a superfine moralist to see as much as that. Two classes of people are directly concerned with this evil, and between them they can do much to mitigate it. They are the parents of boys who are going out to the East, and the heads of firms, or directors and shareholders of companies, whose service such boys enter. This was pointed out in my first article on the subject, and everything that has transpired since only serves to accentuate it. A great deal has been said as to the impossibility of married life for white women in Burma, Assam, and elsewhere. So far as it relates to the unsuitability of jungle or backwood life to English-bred women it is obviously reasonable; but the allegations and the answers go a long way beyond the jungle. When we are told that wives are an inconvenience and married men a trouble to their colleagues and employers, that the companies cannot shape their arrangements to the exigencies of married life among their employees, or even that the frivolity and extravagance of English-bred girls make it impossible for a prudent man to contemplate matrimony until he has somehow "made a pile," what does all this amount to? Simply that the system of concubinage is most convenient to employers and most conducive to the earning of good dividends. In other words, the question is whether marriage is to be systematically discountenanced for European employees, with all the consequences which have now been revealed, merely because this suits the commercial interest of the firms concerned. When the issue is reduced to that footing, can there be any doubt about the answer? I should hope not. At any rate, what has now appeared in TRUTH has shown to all concerned the extent of the evil and the most potent cause of it. I must now leave it in other hands.

"TRUTH" AND THE CHARING CROSS BANK.

The announcement in yesterday's newspapers that Mr. Alfred William Carpenter, the proprietor of the Charing Cross Bank, has filed a petition in bankruptcy and that the business is now in the hands of the Official Receiver, can hardly come as a surprise to regular readers of TRUTH. The bankruptcy of the so-called bank is an event which I predicted long ago. It may be remembered that during the year 1907 I published a series of articles in which I dealt exhaustively with the position of this concern and its pretensions as a bank. The result was that in November of that year Mr. Carpenter commenced an action for libel against TRUTH, which, mainly owing to the plaintiff's protracted resistance to my application for the production of certain of his books, has never yet come to trial. In consequence of the action being kept thus sub judice, I have for the past three years been debarred from making further references to Mr. Carpenter's establishment, except on a few occasions when the matter has come before the Court on interlocutory proceedings. As was reported in TRUTH at the time, the House of Lords, on my appeal last July, decided that I was entitled for the purpose of my defence to the inspection of his books which Mr. Carpenter had refused. The further steps which would have been taken as the result of that judgment have, of course, now been rendered unnecessary by Mr. Carpenter's act of bankruptcy.

My original criticisms of the Charing Cross Bank many years ago were mainly directed against it in the character of a usury shop doing a 60 per cent. bill of sale business. It had for many years combined with this business the borrowing of money from the public in the form of deposits on which very high rates of interest were offered; and so long as the money so borrowed was lent out again at 60 per cent. it seemed feasible that a profitable business might be done. In 1907, however, it came to my notice that the bank was rapidly extending its sphere of operations by opening branches in provincial towns, from which advertisements and prospectuses were constantly issued, calling attention to the favourable terms on which deposits were received. It became fairly evident that the sums thus obtained from investors were very largely in excess of the amount of capital that the bank was employing in its ordinary money-lending business. On the other hand, it was equally obvious that the rate of interest on deposits, amounting to as much as 10 per cent. on those made for a period of five years, could not be paid by any bank engaged in what is usually regarded as the legitimate business of such an institution, and I showed that, as a matter of fact Mr. Carpenter from time to time employed his capital in transactions of a highly speculative character.

One of my chief objections to Mr. Carpenter's system of business was that the title of the Charing Cross Bank, coupled with the statement that it was registered under the Bank Charter Act, was entirely misleading to ignorant and inexperienced investors. To my knowledge a great many imagined that it was a bank in the ordinary sense of the term. They certainly were not aware that it was the absolute property and under the sole control of one individual, nor did they know that nothing in the form of an audited balance-sheet had ever been issued. Most of the newspapers, in reporting the failure of the bank, have reproduced these figures from its current advertisements:—

|---|---|
| Assets | £1,607,949 |
| Liabilities | £1,236,871 |
| Surplus | £371,078 |

In my articles I pointed out that for seven or eight years prior to 1904 the bank published a similar statement of assets, liabilities, and surplus without ever making the alteration of a single figure. In that year the fact was the subject of some comments by Mr. Justice Jelf in an action in which Mr. Carpenter was a plaintiff; and apparently as the result of these judicial remarks the amounts of the assets and liabilities were thereafter increased from year to year till 1907, when the figures given above were first advertised. Those precise figures appeared in an advertisement of the bank which formed the text of an article in TRUTH of October 9, 1907, and the fact that they have been published ever since without any sort of revision—appearing in the bank's announcements in the newspapers down to yesterday—is a sufficient indication of their utter worthlessness as an account of the actual position of the business. As Mr. Justice Jelf intimated, nobody with a glimmering of common sense could really suppose that the assets and liabilities of a banking or any other business would remain absolutely unchanged year after year.

For authentic information as to the real position of the Charing Cross Bank we must now wait until the Official Receiver is able to make a statement. It is, however, certain that very large sums are owing to depositors, and the filing of his petition by Mr. Carpenter points to the probability that serious losses will be inflicted upon many unfortunate people. So far as TRUTH is concerned, it is a satisfaction to know that my readers have invariably been warned against the Charing Cross Bank, not only in paragraphs and articles, but through the medium of "Vigilant's Letter Box."

PIETY AND BUSINESS IN UGANDA.

The joint stock company which seeks to combine piety with business is apt to prove a disappointing investment, and a notable illustration of this tendency has just reached me from the trustee of the estate of a poor clergyman lately deceased. In 1903 this clergyman, who possessed very little means beyond a beggarly stipend of £100 a year, put part of his small savings into the shares of the Uganda Company, Limited, which took over the industrial mission of the Church Missionary Society in Uganda. It was represented that one object of the company would be to secure the extension "under Christian influences" of the industrial work originated by the C. M. S., but at the same time the extension was to be "on commercial lines" and in the prospectuses and circulars that were issued stress was continually laid upon the latter aspect of the undertaking. Originally the capital was £15,000, but in 1905 it was increased to £50,000, and in 1907 to £100,000. There were several different businesses—a building department, a printing office, a trading store, and so on, but in the reports to the shareholders particular attention was given to the favourable prospects from cotton growing, and also from a rubber plantation which was started in 1905. As further capital was raised the predictions of profits became more and more confident, and finally in 1907, when the shareholders were asked to provide another £50,000, it was affirmed that the company's position as a paying concern was practically assured.

In his speeches at the annual meetings the chairman, Mr. T. F. Victor Buxton, generally dealt with the company both from the commercial and the religious point of view. He spoke encouragingly of the business outlook as an incentive to the shareholders to take up the unsubscribed shares, but he added that the directors were most anxious that the Christian element of the work should not be swamped by the commercial. But it had to be confessed that in one respect the results were disappointing, the company losing heavily through extensive thefts of cotton, in which its native employees were implicated. "We have been in correspondence with our representatives in the field," said Mr. Buxton, "about establishing a regular system of daily prayers in the factories, but I am afraid that this has not yet been arranged." This was in 1907. I do not know whether it was anticipated that daily prayers would wean the natives from their dishonest ways, but, at any rate, the company eventually resorted to a more drastic secular remedy in the shape of criminal prosecutions. In the speech in which he mentioned this the chairman mournfully acknowledged that all sorts of difficulties had been encountered in their attempt to make the company "a real help to the work of God in Uganda." Commercially, however, the company seemed to be doing better, and at the end of 1908 a dividend of 2½ per cent. for the year 1907 was distributed. A few months later more shares were offered for subscription, and then in November 1909 came a report showing for the year 1908 a loss of £4,897. This was followed by a call of 5s. a share on upwards of 50,000 shares, on which only 15s. had been paid up; and last week another report appeared with the announcement that during the year ended December 31, 1909, there was a net loss of £974.

There is a class of investors for whom such a concern as the Uganda Company, Limited, with its mixture of business, religion, and philanthropy has an irresistible appeal, and unfortunately they are very often people who can ill afford to lose their money. The deceased clergyman's is a case in point. He was certainly not in a position to indulge in the luxury of devoting £250 to any speculative enterprise or any missionary work in Uganda, but it would seem that he sank that amount in the company's shares in the belief that he could make a reasonable investment while also helping on a good cause. The outcome is that the trustee of his estate has not so far succeeded in finding any one who will give one shilling a share plus the 5s. call for the shares, which are only 15s. paid. The directors of the Uganda Company are eminently respectable and pious gentlemen, and I have not the least doubt that in the promotion and management of the company they have acted with the best intentions. This, however, is but cold comfort for shareholders, who find that the company has failed to achieve the predicted commercial success.

"POOR POLL" GOLDSMITH.

"We had good talk last night, sir," said Johnson.

"Yes, sir," replied Boswell, "you tossed and gored a good many people!"

The art of conversation, we have been led to believe, is but a dear departed in England. No longer do wit and learning flourish among us. We are content with Addison's famous ninepence of ready money, and much prefer that people should keep their thousand pounds to be drawn on by pen. We are often asked to deplore the state of conversation to-day. Let us rather sing a happy hymn of freedom from its intolerable shackles. Conversation, as understood by Johnson (and he is supposed to have touched its high-water mark) was a brutal thing. Even Boswell resorted to the simile of a savage bull when he wished to felicitate his hero on a triumphant evening. Johnson's idea of good talk was that either it consisted of a monologue (by himself) with sufficient intelligent, but strictly curtailed, interpolations to give him the spur, or else it was a series of opportunities for flatly contradicting, snubbing, or taunting the speakers. It was a weapon of offence, a heavy cannon always trained against the cloud-palace of fantasy and imagination. It was indeed capable of acting the Edinburgh reviewer to a man as sensitive as Keats and even more lovable.

Mr. R. Ashe King has just written a book about Goldsmith (published by Messrs. Methuen and Co.). It is described as "a full life," with glimpses of famous men, and so forth. As a matter of fact it is a character-sketch—an explanation, a loving championship—of one of the most charming figures in English literature. We have passed the period when "a starting tear" was the correct tribute to pay to pathos; but it is impossible to read this book without that far more uncomfortable and unwilling praise—a strained throat. Mr. King gives us a picture of Goldsmith from the point of an Irishman, and he explains much which puzzled and misled the solemn and weighty Englishmen among whom Oliver found himself. In those days Irishmen were rarer in England than they are now, and scorn was poured upon them at every slightest provocation. England never has understood the iridescence of Ireland, and never will. In this country it is proper to say exactly what you mean and most improper to mean anything more than you say. Only in England could children ever have been taught to "count twenty before saying anything."

This book, in painting Goldsmith's character and position in the group of famous Englishmen to which he was added, gives us a better understanding of Ireland and England in their mutual relations than all the utterances of politicians since the Irish question first arose. We have Johnson, full of sterling qualities, solemn, weighty, autocratic (when he "rolled himself, as if about to speak," all must be silent—"Stay, stay, Toctor Shonson is going to say something!"), loving Goldsmith from the bottom of his large heart, but continually snubbing him, taunting him, contradicting him, verbally chastising him; Boswell, the narrow-minded, pedantic, jealous little jackal, always ready to slip in his own witticisms, and to throw Goldsmith's sayings into a ridiculous form; Reynolds, a good talker along a straight road, but oblivious of any side-turnings, treating him tolerantly, with a superior smile; Garrick, nursing a little grievance, and never forgiving; and the whole bunch of them constitutionally incapable of the smallest understanding of him. They mistook boyishness and fun for vanity, and what vanity he undoubtedly had they put down to conceit of his personal appearance instead of the deepest distrust of it. They were always ready to call him grotesque and ridiculous when he was fullest of fantasy. He came to a society where conversation was the idol; and his pathetic attempts to shine have called down on him a ridicule which Boswell was only too glad to record. Here was a foredoomed failure. He could not, "if his pistol missed fire, knock you down with the butt-end," as Johnson did. He was totally unfit to "toss and gore" people, because he hated cruelty of any kind. His wit was mistaken for idiocy, and his humour was simply a source of bewilderment to people who lived on conversational beef and beer and had never heard of sauce piquante.

In an age of coarseness Goldsmith was unsullied; the prevalence of spitefulness left him kindly; he was generous to the point of madness; his heart leaped to help the unfortunate; he was weighed down by a sense of his ugliness and awkwardness. He lived a miserable and lonely life, poor, harassed, and full of toil; in his relations with the Jessamy Bride he was another Cyrano. The high spirits to which he bounded when circumstances freed him from natural melancholy for a moment were a source of tolerant amusement to others. He received but little appreciation, and that was what he chiefly needed. He was sensitive in a way that no Englishman is ever likely to understand. Rebuffs bruised him. He longed to be liked and admired, to have a circle of appreciative friends. All he got was abuse and ridicule. To posterity he is the sweetest and serenest of characters, because we have him in his works; to himself he was an unhappy, lonely man. To-day he would be sought after and praised. In France at any time his nature would have been understood. As it was, he was called "an inspired idiot," and it was said of him that "he wrote like an angel and talked like Poor Poll."

Such is the history of this air-bubble, of whom his enemies were for ever anxious to prove that it was merely a little spot of soapy water. Conversation wrecked him in society; for conversation was in those days a Juggernaut, and although many pious victims hastened to throw themselves under the car they were expected to die at once or escape unscathed. Mr. King is to be congratulated on having explained, with admirable restraint, the reason for the treatment Goldsmith's memory has received. He has, as it were, written across the formal praise of Dr. Johnson's Latin epitaph—Here lies a hurt child sleeping.

DANCING—FOREIGN AND ENGLISH.

An article on dancing which appeared in Truth a few weeks since has brought forth some rather interesting correspondence. I suggested then that it was perhaps too much to expect England to produce such a great artist as an Anna Pavlova, an Adeline Genée, or even a Lydia Kyasht, and questioned whether it was temperament or training that our dancers lacked. It seems rather from what I have heard since that it is neither of these so much as opportunity. We are a curious nation who are always ready to fall down and worship foreign art and discourage our own. We flood our theatres with adaptations from French plays, but can you imagine Paris theatres being largely given over to adaptations from the English? The Russians, the French, and the Spanish enthusiastically encourage native dancers, while we who once had a brilliant school of English dancing have allowed it to languish and die. We all still cherish memories of Kate Vaughan, of Letty Lind, of Sylvia Grey, and Mimi St. Cyr, to mention only a few of the brilliant little company who graduated, I believe, in John D'Auban's school; but their successors are not forthcoming, and the reason why is the old reason mentioned above. There is no demand on the part of English managers for native talent, and for this reason only the supply fails. A girl with genius is not encouraged to study, because however great that genius may be no one wants her. Doubtless, if she went abroad and established her reputation in a foreign country she would be duly discovered and brought over, with a flourish of trumpets, by some English manager when he made his annual tour in search of talent, but this is hardly an encouraging prospect to an aspirant. She would have, in the first place, to make her name in some country where native dancers are warmly encouraged. No one considered Isadora Duncan in London until Germany had hall-marked her, and Loie Fuller's greatest success in our own country or in America came after her Paris triumphs. The extent to which this nonsense is carried in England and America is well illustrated by a little story of a worker in another art. He wrote an opera and took it to the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. It was duly considered, with the result that the composer was told that if he could get his work produced in Germany it should then be produced in New York, but the work of an American composer without the Continental seal of approval on it would be useless in his own country. I fancy, indeed, that the English or American composer of grand opera is in an even worse position than the dancer, but this is not my theme for the moment.

The English variety theatre manager nowadays, I am assured, will only look at the non-English dancer, and genuine talent is not his primary consideration. The individual he engages must have some special advertising value about her outside her dancing qualifications. Then he is prepared to engage her, no matter whether she be good or bad. Her dancing—or, more often, posturing—must be sensational, as in the case of La Polaire, or she must have something striking about her clothes, or lack of them, as in the case of Maud Allan, or perhaps she may be famous or notorious in some other walk of life. This readily explains some of the curious "turns" I have occasionally witnessed, when I have wondered who, with any knowledge of dancing, could possibly have endorsed the description on the programme which announced the performer as "The Great —— Dancer." It seems certain that Miss Le Neve could instantly get a good engagement as a dancer, and so could any duchess, but this is not encouraging to legitimate talent. If you go to the theatres the position is little better. Most managers insist on dancers whom they engage being able to sing, and as the two arts very seldom go together dancing is sacrificed to singing. I have seen girls in musical comedy, who might with training have developed into very charming dancers, sacrificing all their possibilities for the sake of singing inane little songs with distressing voices. Until they opened their mouths they were fascinating. Then they became bores.

The long and short of all this is that we need direct encouragement to English dancers. We have the raw material. I am prepared to say that we have also the teachers. But dancers, composers, and dramatists alike labour under the disadvantage of always being considered second-class in their own country. A Russian esteems no one more than Anna Pavlova; a Spaniard no one more than the Carmencita of the moment; a Frenchman no one more than the Rostand, Capus, or Bataille of the moment, but to be English is a disadvantage. And yet we have talent which only needs encouraging.

A QUALM OF (MODERN) LIFF

(After Longfellow.)

Tell it out in mournful numbers,
Our security's a dream;
This insensate nation slumbers,
While the crafty Teutons scheme.

Danger's real. Danger's earnest;
Britain is the German's goal.
Trodden worm, at last thou turnest;
We've not even thy meek soul!

Would we might thy spirit borrow,
Would thy braver part might play,
Ere shall dawn—perhaps to-morrow—
And o'erwhelm us all—"The Day."

Fast relentless time is fleeting;
Soon 'twill be too late to save
England from the threatened beating,
That awaits her on the wave.

Statesmen are but kittle-kattle,
Merged in small, loquacious strife.
John Bull, while those drivellers prattle,
Goes in terror of his life.

Trust ye not Lloyd George the pleasant,
Else you'll soon be good as dead;

Dreadnoughts in the living present
Build, and nought you'll have to dread.

Let not Asquith's falsehoods blind you;
Rise to naval heights sublime;
Leave the Teuton far behind you,
Knock his programme out of time.

First one Dreadnought, then another,
Still another launch again,
Till you shall completely smother
Fritz and choke him off the main.

Send the traitor Asquith skipping!
"Wait and see?" No! Sea and weight!
Tonnage is what counts in shipping;
Multiply the fleet by eight!

NOTES FROM PARIS.

TARIFFS AND STRIKES.

I AM fond of a potato, but I am now unable to get one at the inns where I put up in my excursions. They have in France as many ways of cooking the homely tuber for the midday meal, for one never sees it at dinner, as they had in Goldsmith's time for dressing nettle tops. The hope in the coming winter of comforting pen'orths of pommes frites must be given up by students of both sexes. Potatoes rise so fast in price that they may soon take their place in costliness with truffles. They jumped in August and September in successive bounds from 9 francs the 100 kilos, and are now at 26 francs, with the immediate prospect of rising beyond 30 francs or more. Before the tariffs of M. Méline were in force a tender rib or filet steak, with pommes soufflées, was one of the glories of the fairly cheap French restaurants. In these places they are a Portuguese Royalty—a souvenir only—to those unable to pay extravagant prices. The purée de pommes, which is also the pride of the French cuisine, and used to be a cheap accompaniment to the côtelette, is now served in niggardly proportions, and with margarine as a substitute for butter. Middle-class gourmets will miss the potage Crécy, gras or maigre. Carrots are too dear for it to figure on any tables not spread for the wealthy. They never in previous years rose above 8 francs the 100 kilos. They are now at 24 francs in the wholesale houses, and much dearer when retailed, with the prospect, the greengrocers tell us, of further successive rises. Artichokes and cabbages are within the reach of the cordon bleu, they having resisted the wet summer fairly well, though cabbages are greatly eaten away by caterpillars. One can, therefore, order at restaurant or inn, without fearing to empty one's purse, an artichok à la barigoule or a perdrix à la chartreuse, the very best way to cook an old bird. This is not a less toothsome dish than a well-made Spanish puchero.

In the great English towns housekeepers can fall back on beef and mutton brought in frigid chambers from South America and the colonies, and on cauliflowers from Greece, Calabria, the Netherlands. We have no such resource. Railway tariffs are high. Trusts, combines, and sociétés alimentaires run up prices artificially, so that a five-franc piece is of but small value at a provision dealer's. The greatest sinner in promoting dearness worse than what the wet summer caused is the Société Alimentaire, which bought the Chartreuse business plant. It was founded by M. Poidatz, a joint owner with M. Bunau Varilla of Le Matin. Sugar grows dear. We now hear that rice, which French menagères know how to use so well, is being brought up by a trust.

Is it astonishing that the strike of railway servants took proportions that must terrify the capitalists of the world? What is more astonishing is that M. Briand had not a single word to say in his voluminous speech on the action of the trusts and other combinations for raising prices. Paris reverted, directly the railway strike began, to the state into which it fell exactly forty years ago, with this difference: that every one who had then remained there felt himself or herself a hero or a heroine. There is more in this feeling than those who have not experienced it can understand. One knows the worst and brings all one's moral force to bear on the miseries one has to face. There was something "gamey" in screwing up one's courage to such a point that one could laugh at bombardment. During the bombardment by the Versaillists in the following spring (and it was hotter than that of the Prussians) we used to think it fun to go and watch the bombs bursting in the Avenue du Bois. The Communists had marked the dangerous zone with a rope. It extended for about forty yards, and we used to lean on the rope watching little clouds of smoke that marked the passage of the bombs through the air and how and where they fell. There were occasional casualties from shells within the rope. They only gave keener zest to the amusing excitement.

The cheminots and the railway servants' strike got upon nerves more unpleasantly than the anxieties of the first or second siege of Paris. Worry is a thousand times harder to bear than grim calamity, and far more than men are women exposed to the worrying, tiresome, vulgarising ills of life. The men on strike had the excitement of their meetings. Their wives had to make both ends meet at home as best they could, and to add to the ways and means in picking up what small jobs they could undertake. Do not think they recoiled from the consequences of the great strike. It is remarkable that while the husbands were exalted mentally and morally by the tall talk of some of their leaders, the wives, so far as I can gather, hit the nail well on the head by clamouring in the groups they formed for the opening of the ports for provisions from abroad. The ringleaders had as little to say on this subject. Was this because they had taken a cue from the great landlords of the Cercle des Pommes de Terre?

"Not so!" cries somebody who looks over my shoulder as I write. Who gave the banquet at which the Premier spoke? Le Comité Républicain du Commerce et d'Agriculture. Apart from the members of the Chamber and Senate who attended, more of the guests represented merchants, manufacturers, landlords, and others interested in high prices. Briand would have chilled the "agriculturists had he so much as hinted at a partial opening of the ports as a means to prevent much harder times."

The Cercle des Pommes de Terre is the most aristocratic in France, and the headquarters when Parliament is not in session of the great landlords and other bigwigs of the Right. Its habitation is the whole first floor of the very handsome house built by the late Marquis de Dion at the junction of the Quai d'Orsay and the Boulevard St. Germain, and it looks down materially and in the conceit of its members on the Palais Bourbon. A jeu d'enfer often goes on in its card-room. The present Marquis de Dion often plunged there. I have known of him staying at the card table from about nine in the evening until two in the afternoon, when he dropped in to make a call on a tenant of his father in the entresol, the Marquis del Moral, then Chargé d'Affaires at the Spanish Embassy. Whether he dipped his heritage or not I am unable to say. If so he has set things right by his partnership with Bouton, the brainy mechanic, and Baron Van Zuylen for the manufacture of motors. The Baron had, not long before this partnership was entered into, made, as a waltzer, a conquest of Mlle. Hélène de Rothschild, only daughter and heiress of Baron and Baroness Solomon de Rothschild.

The French railway servants can gain no permanent advantage by their strike. When their English brethren strike the shilling they obtain is to the good. It represents a reality. With our "reformed tariffs" the gain is utterly elusive, a will-o'-the-wisp that nobody can seize and hold. None of the strikes for higher wages has, when successful, brought more than a temporary relief, prices generally having been put up by the monopolists and the combines or individual dealers. The landlords in the capital and country are in the same boat with the manufacturers. Law, custom, and the practice of short leases (three, six, or nine years) give them the advantage of the tenant. In Paris Monsieur Vautour raised his rents a third or a fourth because the Metropolitan enabled his tenants to save in cab hire. In the slummy parts he screwed it up often a half, and in the very thickly inhabited parts near factories about double. Building materials have become so dear that Paris does not expand in proportion to the immigration from the provinces. This enables Monsieur Vautour to do as he pleases. No Minister—Briand, Millerand, or Viviani, who rose to their present altitude through professions of hot and strong Socialism—has ever said a word about unearned increment. Could you lend us Mr. Lloyd George?

The motor has been in the railway crisis as the jury-mast in the disabled ship.

The Portuguese can be as the sheep that went mad when driven to desperation. Generally they are the most long-suffering of patient peoples, and their manners are gentle and have a tinge of Creole indolence. I therefore hope that they will not see in the sending of the Victoria and Albert to Gibraltar to fetch the ex-King Manuel and Queen Amélie to England an act meant to be unfriendly. I know Portugal, and have for years kept in touch with its authors, artists, and professors, and I never doubted that the Royal family now in exile deserved to fall. M. Briand prepared—what he does not often do—his speech of last week with the utmost care and some time in advance. The Portuguese revolution obliged him to make important changes. This accounts for its want of closeness and a certain disorder in the arrangement. It is also more apologetic, I am assured, than it was in the original drafts of the part referring to the attacks on himself. I think he said more than was meet on this subject, though I do not think of applying the maxim, Qui s'excuse s'accuse. He is not a snob. But the extraordinary courtesies different kings within the last two years have extended to him have had some effect on his way of seeing things. An illustrious friend of France lost no opportunity in that time to impress on him and MM. Pichon and Fallières a policy of conciliation towards those members of the Right who had obeyed Leo XIII. in accepting the Republic. Spain and Portugal were spoken of as necessary outworks of the triple understanding, and it was well to regard them as ultra Catholic. The Courts of both were in unison with the people in being devout. Was it not also desirable to remove from the mind of the heir to the Austrian Empire the idea that the Third French Republic is fanatically irreligious? At about the same time attention was called to the action of the Italian Government in regard to the Church as one of courtship, now that France has utterly broken with the latter. The information came from Rome. M. Briand had made up his mind without emphasising these considerations, or almost hinting at them, to stand by what, in his Limoges speech, had given so much offence to those Republicans who are partisans of lay instruction in the Board Schools. Every one knew what his tendency was when he declared for a policy of apaisement. It meant to them a policy of caving in to that part of the Right which wears the faux nez of Republicanism. The revolution in Lisbon and the consternation of the Court of Madrid and the Vatican made it suddenly desire to back the engine.

The habit that is growing up among European sovereigns of acting as roving Foreign Ministers is fraught with dangers. Their minds have not and cannot have the toughness needed for the decisive transaction of great affairs. However liberal they wish to be, they are very prejudiced, and they see things at a special angle, which is not always the right one. They cannot be in the truth of things, and they have very few direct impressions worth much, from the want of the severe discipline that ordinary persons of ordinary situation have to undergo. The minds of those with whom they mix are in Court dress as well as their bodies. No doctor can tell them the truth, though truth alone might turn away Death, who lurks near the door. Snobbism plays a great part in the foreign politics of every country, and the desire for advertisement through conversations with kings, whether at the Elysée Foreign Ministry lunches or at watering-place healtheries. When a stoic, such as Barthelémy St. Hilaire, served as Foreign Minister, no king, merely because a king, could influence his policy. He civilly and firmly held his own. The King of the Hellenes was thus prevented in 1881 from making a dash on Thessaly and Epirus, and in all probability precipitating a great war.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

A MASS meeting of the statues, monuments, and memorial tablets in London, dear Lady Betty, was held in Hyde Park last week, a remarkable demonstration which attracted the sympathising public in their thousands to the Reformers' Tree.

The spectacle was particularly effective. The Albert Memorial from Kensington Gardens occupied the Chair, on the steps of the Memorial being appropriately stationed the Sunday-school Boy from Notting Hill Gate and the Dick Whittington Stone from Highgate Hill. The background to the group was composed of Cleopatra's Needle, the Monument, the Nelson and Duke of York Columns, and the Obelisks.

With the Chair in the centre, two sides of a semicircle were formed respectively by the equestrian statues of the Kings and Royal Personages, and those of the unmounted Sovereigns and Princes.

Facing the imposing array was the statue of Oliver Cromwell, immediately around which were the representations of John Milton, Richard Cobden, John Stuart Mill, and William Ewart Gladstone. Amongst the others present were statues or tablets perpetuating the memory of Lord Beaconsfield, Robert Burns, Lord Byron, George Canning, John Constable, Charles James Fox, Samuel Johnson, Thomas Gainsborough, Sir Thomas Lawrence, Lord Palmerston, Sir Robert Peel, William Pitt, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Mrs. Siddons, J. W. Turner, Robert Stephenson, and John Wesley.

The Queen Victoria Memorial from St. James's Park was unable to attend. The figures of Gog and Magog —kindly lent for the occasion by the City of London— the lions from Trafalgar Square, and the Griffin from Temple Bar were present to maintain order.

The Albert Memorial addressed the meeting, saying: —"Your Majesties, Your Royal Highnesses, My Lords, Ladies and Gentlemen,—The veritable 'Great Unwashed' in this country are not the populace, but ourselves, for soap and the scrubbing-brush have not approached most of us in the memory of man." (Loud cries of "Shame! Shame!") "This is one of the grievances we are here to ventilate; there are many others." (Hear, hear.) "In my time I was a prominent, and, I hope, an intelligent, patron of the Arts in Great Britain"—(vociferous cheers)—"and I think I am entitled to express some dissatisfaction at being enshrined in one of the gaudiest memorials the Empire possesses." (Great and long continued applause.) "The noblest building there is in London is Westminster Hall, and the interior of this magnificent edifice continues to be disfigured by the presence of the villainous statues of the Kings which generation upon generation of competent critics have denounced." (Enthusiastic cheering.) "My Lord Protector Cromwell is not a favourite with all who are present here, but none are so prejudiced against him as to deny that he was the most brilliant light cavalry officer the country has ever produced. It amounts to little less than an outrage, therefore, that the spurs on the statue of the Protector at Old Palace Yard are upside down; the right spur, moreover, being on the left foot and the left on the right." (Prolonged laughter, in which the statue of Charles I. heartily joined.) "My friend Lord Shaftesbury was an eminent philanthropist, and I feel confident he will permit me to add that he was of a somewhat serious temperament. Nevertheless, the central idea of the monument in Piccadilly Circus which perpetuates his memory is that a winged figure buries a shaft—the process being presumably connected with the name of Shaftesbury!" (Loud laughter.)

"Your Majesties, Your Royal Highnesses, My Lords, Ladies and Gentlemen,—This is the first time that most of us have met, and only an increasing accumulation of grievances has caused us to assemble here to-day. I appeal to the meeting for support in the expression of the strongest disapproval of many of the monuments which disfigure this glorious city." (Cries of "Scarecrows.") "The description suggested may be appropriate; it is not of a sufficiently dignified character to be applied by the Chair." (Laughter.) "The present First Commissioner of Works, Mr. Lewis Harcourt, is a man of refined taste who has done more to improve the appearance of London than has any of his predecessors in the appointment which he now holds." (Hear, hear, and loud cheering.) "The meeting earnestly and confidently appeals to him to relieve us of at least some of the grave grievances to which attention has been directed on this occasion. The Reverend Mr. Sydney Smith suggests that London should be defined as a haphazard crop of bricks dotted with monumental scarecrows. London is the largest and richest city in the world; it is a disgrace to the Nation that to it such a definition should be even remotely applicable." (Enthusiastic and prolonged cheering.) The meeting then dispersed.

A hitherto unpublished telegraphic message from the G-rm-n Emp-r-r is printed here to reassure the timid who have been terrified by the Tory accounts of the defenceless condition of England: "Mobilise your monuments. None but the savage could face them.—W-lh-lm."

. . . . .

It is not generally known that before his flight the K-ng of P-rt-g-l telegraphed to the British Government: "Lend me the statues of the Kings in Westminster Hall. The sight of them will save the situation." The authorities here, however, decided that they could not sanction a proceeding so closely allied to "the methods of barbarism."

The eighteenth century is the most attractive of the centuries, and as this is the more generally recognised a vast library of works concerning it is accumulating. Mr. Ralph Nevill has published several brightly written books dealing with various phases of life in the eighteenth century. His latest, "Sporting Days and Sporting Ways" (Duckworth and Co.), adds greatly to the value of his other works on the period, for it contains material which fills another gap in the information we have of the men, women, institutions, and customs of the time.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

CORRESPONDENCE.

CONSCRIPTION AND PHYSIQUE.

Sir,—As you occasionally deal with the subject of compulsory military service, that is to say, conscription, the following information may interest you.

It is claimed by the advocates of conscription—by whatever name they are good enough to call it—in this country that it helps to improve the national physique. The Italian statistics for 1907 were published here last year. They show that of 500,599 inscrits 121,986 were "rejected as unfit." The German statistics for 1908 include 34,183 "unfit for service," besides a very much larger number "put back." In both Italy and Germany the conscription system has been in force for more than a generation, so that its effect in improving the physique of the people of those countries can only be regarded as extremely disappointing.

The belief is frequently announced by its advocates here, that the Continental system of compulsion, if we would only adopt it, would result in the training to arms of the whole youth of the country. It certainly does not do so in the countries in which it has been in operation for many years. In 1907 in Italy of 377,879 young men who became liable to service 193,269 were enrolled in the "active army"; that is to say, less than 52 per cent. The number really subjected to training is probably considerably less than that, because no fewer than 95,886 youths were placed in the "third category" of the Active Army.

The figures for Germany tell a similar tale. The number of young Germans who in 1908 reached the age for military service was 527,280, of these 257,490 were enrolled in the Army and in the Navy, so that the two services together took less than 49 per cent. of those liable to serve.

The above figures prove beyond all possibility of disproof that compulsory service does little or nothing to improve the national physique, and leaves one-half of the male youth of a nation untrained.

An American writer, Mr. Charles E. Woodruff, has recently (February, 1910), pointed out how hardly the compulsory system presses on the poorer classes. He says, "though the European war rations are very large . . . . the peace ration, particularly in Germany, is small, because the soldier is expected to get money and food from home. It is part of every one's tax to serve in the Army; and, later, to feed his sons who are serving there."—Your obedient servant,

ROUND THE MARKETS.

A Cheerful Week.—The Continental Cinematograph Entertainment.—Monetary Prospects.—Canadian and Mexican Rails.

SPEAKING generally, the Stock Markets last week favoured the investor and the "bull" speculator. It is more than a little curious when one comes to think of it how slight has been the effect upon markets of the two historic events upon the Continent. We have learnt of the shattering of a dynasty in Portugal, and before the war correspondents had completed their narrations came information of a wholesale railway strike in France, involving just the possibility of a civil war. Yet both events have, thanks in one case to the unity of the people and in the other to the firmness displayed by a Cabinet Minister, passed with the rapidity of a cinematograph entertainment. It is certainly many years since two happenings involving such great issues have left so small a mark upon the stock markets.

The event of the week was perhaps the reawakening of activity in Americans, Wall Street having confirmed recent indications that it does not mean to allow the coming elections to hinder it from inaugurating a "bull" campaign. Home Rails, too, continued to make steady headway, and although there were some fluctuations in the Southern stocks during the interruption of the Continental services, prices in that group made a rapid recovery. Among gilt-edged securities India stocks, which I still regard as the pick amongst Trustee stock at current prices, hardened on the success of the Government's issue of £4,000,000 3½ per cent. short-dated bonds. These the Money Market eagerly snapped up, and the paper realised an average price of £99 11s. 7.25d. per cent. Consols gave way a little on the competition set up by an issue of Straits Settlements 3½ per cent. stock to an amount of £2,750,000. The Consol Market is also watching monetary developments closely, because a 5 per cent. Bank-rate is still a possibility before the year is out. Last week the reserve of the Bank of England was down to £24,353,000, and since then further gold withdrawals have taken place to a total of over 1¼ millions. The Egyptian drain is nearly over, but India has to be reckoned with, and possibly other countries as well. The reserve, therefore, could do with a little augmenting, and it remains to be seen whether the Bank's purchases of gold in the open market will be sufficient to save the discount rate going above the present 4 per cent. level.

A sharp rise in Canadian Pacifics to 202½ was accompanied by rumours—for which there is at present no confirmation—that the board would shortly announce the payment of a 5 per cent. increased bonus from land profits. Trunks have been dull, though the report issued the other day was by no means a bad one. The company during the June half-year spent over £300,000 more out of revenue upon maintenance and renewals, and its engine and car renewals suspense account was reduced by £122,000 to the comparatively harmless sum of £75,600. The Mexican Railway report threw no light upon the company's doings with oil fuel. The balance-sheet showed one alteration which aroused a good deal of discussion, the item renewals account overspent having risen £33,000 to a total of £141,741. Information on both points will doubtless be given at tomorrow's meeting.

RAILWAYS.

Industrial Peace at Home—The Big French Railway Strike — More Bargains — Great Westerns, Midland Deferred, and Great Easterns.

A restoration of peace in the cotton trade has speedily been followed by a settlement of the lock-out amongst the boilermakers in the northern shipyards, and by better news from the Welsh colliery districts. Before this happy consummation the world was startled afresh by the serious revolt on the part of French railway employees. This trouble materially affected the Continental traffic of our southern railways, and naturally brought about a reaction in prices, though the fall did not go far because the issues involved were of so serious a nature as to make it tolerably certain that the French Government would be compelled to take swift measures to end the strike. So far as the heavy lines are concerned the market has been firm all the week. With the clearing of the labour clouds at home it is hard to see what is to prevent Home Rails making a recovery as the months go on. The movement may not be very marked at first, because the public will not after its long absence from the market return all at once in full force. But apart from public distrust of a market that has been a sore disappointment to holders for the last dozen years, the influences just now are nearly all favourable. A summary of them includes fine traffic returns, the knowledge that important economies are still being practised, the consequent promise of further increases in dividends, and a total absence of inflation about prices. Another point of which little general notice has been taken is the policy adopted by several companies in the last year or two of establishing reserve funds out of profits which should be available to equalise dividends in the event of any material setback of a temporary character in earnings. In the last few weeks I have dealt with some of the bargains in the Home Railway market, and those who bought on my first recommendations already command moderate profits. It is worth while now dealing with one or two other stocks that offer scope to the speculative investor.

The Great Western Railway, which on the score of mileage takes an easy first place amongst English railways, possesses exceptional scope for development in its revenues and for economies in working costs. In the last few years the company has spent capital more freely than any other railway upon new works and extensions, including the establishment of the Irish steamboat service viâ Fishguard and the completion of the new shortened route to Birmingham. The burden of this outlay has already been felt, but the benefit has as yet only been realised in part. The company has abandoned its former policy of aloofness from other lines, and the agreement entered into this year with the South-Western, having as its object the abolition of unnecessary competition, has yet to be reflected upon the company's expense ratio. To date in the current half-year gross receipts have shown gratifying expansion. The published increase for fourteen weeks is £156,000, or at the rate of over £300,000 for the half-year. In the December half of 1909 the company paid a dividend on its ordinary stock at the rate of 7 per cent., and in June last at the rate of 4 per cent., making 5½ per cent for the twelve months. To pay another 1 per cent. per annum for the half-year (or ½ per cent. actual), and thereby raise the dividend on Westerns to a 6 per cent. basis, requires a sum of £185,000. Prospects suggest that this should be managed in respect of the current half-year. If so, Great Westerns at current price would return a yield of 5 per cent. The board might decide, of course, to set aside part of its increased earnings to reserve, though even if it did, and the dividend was in consequence not immediately raised to a 6 per cent. basis, the progress the line is making suggests that such an increase may be forthcoming in the course of the next twelvemonth after liberal provision has been made for reserves. The prices of and dividends upon Great Western ordinary in recent years have been as follows:—

| | Prices. | | Dividends. | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Highest. | Lowest. | 1st half. | 2nd half. |
| 1905 | 145⅞ | 135½ | 3½ | 7 |
| 1906 | 144 | 122⅜ | 3½ | 7 |
| 1907 | 135 | 113¾ | 3½ | 7 |
| 1908 | 126 | 115⅜ | 3½ | 7 |
| 1909 | 125¼ | 117 | 3½ | 7 |
| 1910 | 127 7/16 | 118¼ | 4 | — |

The present price is 124, which is well below the highest of any year out of the six, although the dividend for 1910 is virtually certain to be better than for thirteen years past, while the general outlook has probably never been brighter.

The Midland Railway to date has a published gross increase of £128,000, or at the rate of £238,000 for the six months. The company is known to be still reaping the fruits of its co-operative policy with the North-Western and other lines, so that an advance of £100,000 in net revenue for the six months would not be at all surprising. This would permit of the dividend on the deferred stock being raised by 1 per cent—namely, from 3½ to 4½ per cent., making the distribution for the whole year 3½, against 3. Perhaps the company may elect to be extra liberal in the matter of reserves, and so for the purposes of this estimate I will take a probable increase of ½ per cent. in the dividend. This would make the return for the year 3¼ per cent., and on that basis Midland deferred at 64½ would give a yield of over 5¼ per cent. The Great Eastern has lately been showing a considerable expansion in its receipts, which is the more gratifying in view of the bold step taken by the management a year or two ago in reducing certain suburban passenger fares with a view to meeting tramway and motor 'bus competition. In the first fourteen weeks of the current half-year gross earnings have risen £60,000, an improvement which goes a long way towards justifying the remark of Lord Claud Hamilton at the last meeting that the company had turned the corner. Allowing for under-publication, the increase in receipts may be over £100,000 for the full six months. It takes £76,000 to pay 1 per cent. per annum for the half-year on Great Eastern ordinary, and there is a reasonable possibility of this sum being forthcoming. For the December half of 1909 the dividend was 4 per cent., and therefore the outlook now is for a 5 per cent. return. For the June half-year a distribution of 1¾ per cent. was made on "Easterns," after placing £30,000 to contingency fund, so that for the entire year a dividend of 3⅜ per cent. may be forthcoming. At the current price the return to an investor would be about 5⅛ per cent. on his outlay.

Yankees Soaring—The Campaign for the Rise—The Case for the Bull.

Americans last week were the strongest market in the House. It had been apparent for some weeks past that the controlling houses had the market well in hand, for, despite several important adverse influences, including the continued depression in the iron and steel trade, the general increase in the ratio of railroad expenses and the approach of the elections, prices have been slowly but steadily moving upwards. Last week the pace quickened, and on Friday the volume of sales in the New York Stock Exchange rose to near the million mark. It is evident that the rise means something more than a mere drive against the "bears," and some of the causes of the market's bullishness are worth mentioning. In the first place considerable satisfaction is felt at the definite realisation of splendid maize and oats crops, which much more than compensate for the smaller yield of wheat. New York financiers place more importance upon the current crop than the current trade depression, and, taking the long view, they are right. While trade is bad now, good crops should go a long way towards helping a revival later on. Then, again, the position in copper, which so long has been a drag upon the market, is now steadily mending. A good deal remains to be accomplished before the copper market can be restored to perfect health, but it is noteworthy that since June the total visible supplies in Europe and America have been reduced from 179,129 tons to 160,386 tons, and, as was announced in its report, issued the other day, the Rio Tinto Company is now co-operating with the American producers in reducing its output until the equilibrium between supply and demand is restored.

As regards politics, it is admittedly strange that Wall Street can look forward to a Democratic win with so much equanimity. There is, of course, no love lost between Wall Street and the Democrats, and the success of the latter party must tend towards Tariff Reform of the kind that does not suit the trusts. But for the time being Wall Street is so incensed against Mr. Roosevelt and his trust "busting" campaign that it openly welcomes a Democratic victory if the alternative is a Rooseveltian victory. As I have previously mentioned, a Democratic House of Representatives, if elected, could do nothing to alter existing legislation for more than a year, and so the financial community seems content to leave out politics as an adverse factor for the present. There remains to be dealt with the application of the Railroads for permission to raise freight rates. This matter cannot be decided by the Inter-State Commerce Commission before February, and meantime the old schedules remain in force. But lately the opinion has been more widely expressed that the Railroads will get their way to some extent, at all events, and thus be able to meet the advances made in wages which have seriously affected expense ratios. The attitude of the men's unions in deciding to support the companies in the endeavour to obtain higher carrying rates has, of course, done much to strengthen the hope of a favourable decision.

The foregoing are the leading arguments being used for a higher level of prices in the stock market. It will be admitted that there is a good deal in them, and already brokers in the States have encouraged a fair amount of public buying. For those on this side who think of taking a hand it is hardly necessary nowadays to add a word of caution. The Yankee market is not one for the small speculator, but the fascination it possesses for the man of means who is in a position to keep a very close watch upon developments is undoubted. There are a good many "ifs" about the "bull" arguments just put forward, and were the market one that moved only in response to a public investment demand it is probable that stocks would be comparatively neglected until the political and financial outlook could be more clearly determined. But the market is always manipulated, and as its leaders are in the nature of things invariably committed to the "bull" side they are eager to seize upon the first signs of improvement in the situation, however faint, to give prices a hoist. A number of leading roads are wanting to raise money, prospective borrowers having lately accumulated in consequence of the unfavourable conditions prevailing for some time for issuing bonds. If, therefore, Wall Street can change the sentiment towards the market it will not only have raised the value of its large stock-holdings but paved the way for some successful bond issues, say, in the early part of next year.

RUBBER.

Business Increasing—British Rubber Consumption—A Valuation Table—Tremelbye—Taiping.

Brokers report a general increase of business in the rubber share market, and last week's settlement was the largest for some time, "make-up" prices at last showing a preponderance of gains in the face of some enforced sales from the East. There has, too, been an increased trade demand for raw rubber, although the commodity still appears to be subject to a good deal of speculative manipulation. Some interesting rubber figures may be extracted from the Board of Trade returns, and to these I append a statement of the declared stocks existing at the end of last month:—

Rubber Imports and Exports for the United Kingdom.

| | Nine months to September 30, | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| | Tons. 1908. | Tons. 1909. | Tons. 1910. |
| Imports | 21,232 | 25,719 | 34,322 |
| Exports | 12,395 | 14,464 | 18,188 |
| Retained for Home Consumption | 8,837 | 11,255 | 16,134 |
| Declared Stocks held in U.K. at end of month | 1,167 | 1,029 | 2,010 |

In addition undeclared stocks amounting to about 530 tons are said to be held in this country, probably awaiting the development of the American demand. Read in conjunction with the American import statistics which I published last week, the figures point at least to largely increased rubber consumption, which, if maintained, should absorb without much difficulty the increasing outputs from the Eastern plantations; and a broader view of the situation should go a long way towards counteracting the exaggerated effect which day to day fluctuations in Mincing Lane have upon the investor. Perhaps the soundest cure for the attacks of "rubber nerves" which have developed so strongly of late is to mark down our scale of anticipated profits below the level of ruling values, and to treat as so much good fortune any additional profit which may accrue from sales above the adopted figures. I welcome, therefore, the estimates which have been put forward by my able contemporary the Straits Times in its elucidation of the seven years' purchase valuation basis. Let us assume a moderate scale of future yields lower than that which the experience of the best companies would lead us to adopt. Further, let us disregard sale prices already obtained for 1910 and forward sales for next year, and let us rely only on such moderate estimates as will provide us with a good margin, say 5s. per lb. profit for this year, falling year by year until no more than 1s. 6d. per lb. profit is expected. We will take our data as under:—

| Yield per acre. | | Profit per lb. | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Age of trees. | Yield. | Year. | Net profit. |
| 5th year | 100 lbs. | 1910 | 5/- per lb. |
| 6th ,, | 200 lbs. | 1911 | 4/- per lb. |
| 7th ,, | 300 lbs. | 1912 | 3/6 per lb. |
| 8th ,, | 350 lbs. | 1913 | 3/- per lb. |
| 9th ,, | 400 lbs. | 1914 | 2/6 per lb. |
| increasing 50 lbs. per acre annually until in the 17th year the yield is 800 lbs. | | 1915 | 2/- per lb. |
| | | 1916 and later | 1/6 per lb. |

Few, I think, will quarrel with these estimates, and my seven years' purchase scale which is based upon them does not differ materially from the scale which I used when rubber was a dull market twelve months ago.

While heaping some undeserved ridicule upon the well-known valuer, Mr. Malcolm Cumming, the Straits Times publishes a valuation scale which Mr. Cumming would I am sure be among the first to repudiate. For my contemporary (apart from some apparent errors of but little importance in its calculations for two-year-old and eight-year-old rubber) makes the curious blunder of estimating seven years' profits, and disregarding the expenses—a system which, if adopted by the investor, would certainly lead to unfortunate results. It is the important omission of expenses which leads the Straits Times to value at £40 per acre rubber which has not yet been planted, and to give £55 as the value of an acre of newly-planted land. In my scale deductions are made for the cost of bringing young rubber into bearing, and for the provision of buildings and machinery; and some allowance is made for the risks to which young rubber is subject. Based on the low range of profits given above, my estimate of the profits which may be expected within the next seven years from an average acre of good rubber of various ages is as under:—

SEVEN YEARS' PURCHASE VALUATION TABLE.

| Age of Rubber. | Seven years' net profits. |
|---|---|
| Newly planted | £12 10 0 |
| 1 year old | 30 0 0 |
| 2 years old | 85 0 0 |
| 3 ,, | 175 0 0 |
| 4 ,, | 302 10 0 |
| 5 ,, | 378 15 0 |
| 6 ,, | 445 0 0 |
| 7 ,, | 498 15 0 |
| 8 ,, | 552 10 0 |
| 9 ,, | 589 5 0 |
| 10 ,, | 660 0 0 |

The figures for young rubber are high enough, and my readers may think that £660 is a big price for an acre of ten-year-old rubber, but it fairly represents the total of the profits which under good management may be looked for within seven years with rubber profits gradually falling from 5s. to 1s. 6d. per lb. The objection to which I have alluded in these columns arises when the market valuation of an estate approaches an average of £600 per acre for young rubber and old rubber alike.

THE MOST COMPLETE List of Rubber and Oil Share Quotations will be found in every Saturday's issue of "The Financial Times," 1d. daily. On sale everywhere.

As an example, it may be instructive to show how a well-managed estate like Tremelbye works out when tested by this valuation scale:—

TREMELBYE.

| Acres. | Age o Rubber. | Valuation per Acre. | Total. |
|---|---|---|---|
| 108 | Six years | at £445 0 0 | £48,060 |
| 249 | Four year ¾ | at 302 10 0 | 75,323 |
| 1,013½ | Three years | at 175 0 0 | 177,362 |
| 67 | Two years | at 85 0 0 | 5,695 |
| 32 | One year | at 30 0 0 | 960 |
| 43 | Newly planted | at 12 10 0 | 537 |
| 35 | Neglected rubber | at 10 0 0 | 350 |
| 650 | Jungle | at 3 0 0 | 1,950 |
| Unexpended capital | | | 5,065 |
| Divide by number of shares, 58,552 | | | £315,302 |
| Value of share | | | £5 7 6 |

This accords fairly well with the market quotation, and a purchaser of Tremelbye should see his money back in dividends within seven years if rubber does not average below the very moderate prices named above. The market acreage-valuation of Tremelbye is now about £200 per acre, and a buyer on that basis may not only expect substantial dividends for seven years—say, an average not far short of 14 per cent.—but should obviously be better off at the end of that period than an investor who has paid some thousands per cent. premium for his shares. Readers who have followed my reasoning of late will, I hope, see the advisability of taking advantage of any substantial rise in prices this autumn to exchange their "heavy" shares for something "lower down," and Tremelbye certainly furnishes an attractive opportunity.

The directors of the leading companies are now recognising that they can keep their shares at a big figure only by adopting a wise extension policy, so as to increase their reserves of young rubber, and thereby, of course, reducing the average of their heavy acreage valuations. Kuala Lumpur, in the very satisfactory report just issued, announces the allocation of £20,000 from this year's profits for this purpose. Anglo-Malay proposes taking £70,000 from profits within the next six years with a similar object. Fortunately, it may be urged that wealthy companies can afford these sums. Dividends, of course, must to some extent suffer, but the necessity for this policy is perfectly clear to all who have eyes to read the signs of the times. Rubber as an investment will hold its own, and my seven years' profit table will show that the market offers exceptional opportunities for money-making, but it is desirable that share values should not be pushed beyond a level which will give an investor from 10 to 14 per cent. on his money.

At the Taiping statutory meeting last Wednesday the chairman announced that there are on the company's estate some old trees planted twenty years ago, which have attained a girth of sixty to ninety inches and a height of 160 feet. They yielded in 1907, 1908, and 1909 14 lb. of rubber per tree. The output of dry rubber from the estate for the month of August was 1,700 lb. and September 2,200 lb., and the estimate for October is 2,500 lb. The labour force is not yet strong enough, but is increasing, and it is expected that Mr. Boyd's estimate of 55,000 lb. for the year from September will be exceeded.

In May last I told my readers on the authority of my Perak correspondent that some of the oldest trees on Kamuning estate were yielding 20 lbs. of rubber per tree, and doubts were expressed by my contemporaries as to the accuracy of my information. The announcement made by Sir William Treacher at Monday's meeting is worth repeating for the guidance of my critics. "Among the older trees tapped," said Sir William, "were 280 about twenty years old which averaged a little over 23 lbs. of dry rubber, or, say, at the rate of 25 lbs. for twelve months, and, as my friend Mr. Traill remarks, when they become accustomed to good milking they will probably yield a good deal more." The paragraph is now going the rounds of the Press, but TRUTH was five months in advance of its contemporaries.

The F.M.S. Company announces a dividend payable November 1 of 55 per cent., making, with the interim dividend already paid, 80 per cent. for the year ending May 31 last. The old shares of 500 francs and the one-tenth parts must be exchanged for new shares of 50 francs before the above-named dividend is paid. Holders of bearer shares should effect the exchange of certificates and the collection of their dividends through their bankers.

MINES.

A Better Tone—City Deep Cable—Oceana and London Wall Trust Results—Associated Position—Kalgurli Ore Reserves.

Not before it was desired, the Mining markets developed a better tone towards the end of last week, and prices recovered to some extent in most sections. Dealers depressed the principal South Africans on the news of the French strike, as they anticipated another flood of Continental realisations, but the expected did not happen, and repurchasing by those who were short of shares soon caused a rally. The firmness of Paris encouraged speculators on this side, and a little "shop" support induced a certain amount of fresh speculation for the rise in South Africans, while in the copper and other groups connected with the base metals the rise in the metal markets exercised a stimulating influence.

A portion of the City Deep milling plant will start crushing in December. So states an official cable which was issued at the end of last week. It is a pity the announcement was not made earlier—there is no apparent reason why it should not have been—as the shares had been a dull market, and the relapse in the price doubtless gave rise to some uneasiness amongst the shareholders. The original estimate was that the plant would commence crushing this month, and it would appear that City Deep management is not to blame for the delay. The explanation lies in the loss of a steamer carrying electrical machinery for the Rand Mines Power Supply Company, which company is to supply the City Deep with power to run its plant. The official cable adds that the Power Company expects to be able to supply during December the electric current required, and the City Deep management anticipates, once a portion of the mill has started, gradually to increase the scale of milling operations until the entire plant is at work. The development of the mine is stated to continue to give very satisfactory results.

The dividend of five per cent. quite recently declared by the directors of the Oceana Consolidated Company brings the return to shareholders for the financial year ended June 30 last up to 10 per cent., so that with the 10s. shares quoted at 15s. each the yield is nearly 7 per cent. The annual report to be presented at the meeting to be held to-day shows a considerably improved position compared with that disclosed a year ago. The profit realised by sales of shares and investments, dividends, etc., amounted to £193,600, as against £43,000 in 1908-9, and after allowing for expenses a net balance is shown of £178,300, which compares with £25,800. The dividends absorb £93,300, a sum of £50,000 is being transferred to an account for the equalisation of dividends, and £60,000 odd is being carried forward. It is stated that at market prices on June 30 last the company's quoted securities showed an appreciation above the values appearing in the balance-sheet of £146,520. The board of the Oceana Consolidated, as now constituted, has only held office since the beginning of last year, and is therefore to be congratulated upon the marked change for the bter in the company's position that has since taken place, but it strikes me as being rather early to talk of increasing the capital of the concern by creating a further two million shares of 10s. each. This the directors say they feel justified in recommending, "having regard to the development of the company's business," but shareholders are not likely to have forgotten that it is less than two years since the capital was reduced to £1,000,000 from the figure to which it is now proposed to raise it.

A dividend at the rate of 60 per cent. is by no means a bad result for the first year of a company's existence. This the London Wall Trust has to its credit, but after looking through the accounts which have just been issued to the shareholders I have come to the conclusion that in making such a distribution the directors were rather too liberal. The profit realised from the date of the company's formation in May, 1909, to the end of last June was £50,322. The dividend of six shillings per share and tax absorbed £45,348, so that only £4,974 remains to be carried forward. Having earned so substantial a profit—mainly, I believe, out of Rhodesians—the directors should, I think, have taken the opportunity to initiate a reserve fund, with a view to the equalisation of dividends in less favourable periods. A Rhodesian boom cannot be expected to recur every year. When the dividend was declared the shares of the London Wall Trust (which is a member of what is known as "the Willoughby group") were 10s. paid. A further five shillings per share has since been called up, raising the issued capital of the concern to £112,500, which sum is fully represented by the assets, less liabilities, shown in the balance-sheet made up to June 30 last, as will be seen from the following:—

|---|---|
| Investments | £81,291 |
| Loans at short call | 52,179 |
| Cash at bank | 7,194 |
| | £140,664 |
| Sundry creditors | 26,319 |
| Balance | £114,345 |

The investments have been taken in at cost or market price, whichever was the lowest. How their present market value compares with the balance-sheet figure the directors do not say, and as there is no schedule of assets in the report it is impossible for shareholders to gain even a rough idea of the position in this respect. While the directors do not seem to think it necessary to be informative in their report, they are not above asking for their remuneration to be increased. At present the rate of remuneration is £100 per annum each director and, between them, 1 per cent. of the balance of net profits each year after 10 per cent. has been paid to the shareholders. It is now proposed to raise the 1 per cent. to 5 per cent. This proposition seems to me a bit premature, to say the least.

The report of Professor Liveing, the consulting engineer of the Associated Gold Mines of Western Australia, who was sent out to investigate the position of affairs at the company's property, does not contain much of a nature calculated to cheer the hearts of the shareholders. Professor Liveing considers no exact estimate of the ore reserves of the Kalgoorlie mines possible, but after going thoroughly into the Associated position he thinks it probable there are 500,000 tons of ore developed of between 6 and 7 dwts grade "with a quite possible error of 1 dwt. either way." This practically confirms the manager's estimate, which was subsequently withdrawn. The consulting engineer expresses the opinion that the future of the mine from a dividend point of view depends almost entirely on the result of further development. He advocates a vigorous policy of development, "for (he says) the mine still contains much unexplored ground at many levels which offers reasonable expectation of further ore bodies, or extension of existing ones, being discovered, particularly at moderate depths from the surface." The company has first-class securities representing a reserve equal to nearly 6s. per share, so that with the quotation at 9s. the market is allowing 3s. per share for such profit in sight as there may be and for speculative possibilities.

The manager of the Kalgurli mine, in his cable giving a fresh ore reserves estimate, also remarks upon the impossibility of making a close calculation owing to the erratic nature of the ore bodies both in formation and value. However, he thinks it "perfectly safe" to place the Kalgurli's reserves at a minimum of 400,000 tons, "taking into account nothing below the 1,550 ft. level." He does not definitely state the average value of this tonnage, but leaves it to be inferred that it is about 55s. per ton. At July, 1909, the ore reserves were estimated at 430,000 tons averaging 57s. 2d. per ton. The latest estimate represents about four years' supply for the Kalgurli's plant, and the "profit in sight" would appear to be in the neighbourhood of £3 10s. per share. The current quotation is about 6½. The Kalgurli is paying quarterly dividends of 6s. 3d. per share, so that the return at the present price is 19 per cent. Kalgurlis are a narrow market—that is to say it takes comparatively little buying or selling to affect the quotation.

THE BASE METAL GROUPS—INTERESTING ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE TINTO BOARD—AMALGAMATED ZINC'S FIRST DIVIDEND—NIGERIAN TIN.

Copper, the metal, and copper shares have improved on the announcement made by the directors of the Rio Tinto, in their interim report, that they have decided to reduce the output of fine copper, having come to the conclusion that the remedy for the persistently low range of prices for the metal must be found in a reduction of the world's stocks. The Tinto board adds that "the company being the largest European producer, this reduction on our part has met with practical appreciation on the other side of the Atlantic, and we have every reason to believe that as the months go on a considerable diminution will be seen in the world's stocks." In the case of the Tinto itself it is estimated that the reduction of output will before the end of the year exceed 2,000 tons as compared with last year's quantity, and in the circumstances it is not very surprising to learn that consumers of the metal have been purchasing freely against their requirements during the past week. The Tinto dividend for the half-year ended June 30 last is 25s. per share. This compares with 30s. per share for each of the two previous half-years.

Lead, silver, and zinc, as well as copper, have improved in price, and the outlook for the Broken Hill group is brighter in consequence. The Amalgamated Zinc Company has just announced its initial dividend, which is expected to prove the first of a very satisfactory series. The amount is 1s. per share, and the directors state that their policy will be to make distributions quarterly. A sum of £25,000 has been set aside for the creation of a dividend equalisation fund. In quarters which should be well informed Amalgamated Zincs, now nearly 35s., are expected to reach £2 before very long.

American consumers of tin are stated to have been buying freely, and reports from the tin-plate districts are encouraging as regards the prospects of this metal maintaining its present satisfactory price, if not of improving upon it. During the past week there has been fresh "nibbling" by speculators at several of the Nigerian tin shares, and given genial general market conditions a rise in prices in this group should be only a question of time. The Naraguta maintained its output at 45 tons last month, which represents a gross value of about £5,000 with tin at its present price, and the company announces having acquired additional tin-bearing ground adjoining its present property. The recent registration of a "Nigerian Smelting Corporation" is an interesting feature in connection with this group. Several of the mining companies are concerned in this promotion, and I am told it means that in the course of a year or two the tin exported from Northern Nigeria will be metallic tin, instead of the more bulky tin oxide. Transport costs will thereby be reduced to some extent.

Those of my readers who are desirous of possessing up-to-date particulars of the various companies interested in Nigerian alluvial tin will find such details in a little manual compiled by Mr. H. A. Meredith, and just published by the Financial Times, 72, Coleman Street, E.C. It is styled the "West African Market Handbook," and contains much useful information concerning West African mining and finance companies in general, besides maps of the goldfields and the Northern Nigerian tin field. The price is 2s. 6d. net.

TRUTH CAUTIONARY LIST for 1910, 128 pages bound in cloth, price 1s. net, by post 1s. 2d., is now ready, and may be obtained from all booksellers and railway bookstalls.

INDUSTRIALS.

OIL SHARES—THE MARKET SHOWS MORE RESISTANCE—ANGLO-SOUTH AMERICAN BANK—PEARS' PROFITS.

There has been a fair amount of quiet support for Industrials during the week. Oils have continued in a state of unrest, but showed some strong periods. Shells were again made the sport of powerful contending interests, and until the oil war is settled they must continue to fluctuate in a way that will prevent the market as a whole from settling down. At one time Shells had a sharp rise on the rumour, which appears to be well founded, that the Shell group is to take a big interest in Egyptian oil. Burmahs were helped by a report emanating from good quarters in Glasgow that the dividend would be maintained in spite of the recent increase in the company's capital and the turmoil in the trade. As regards Maikop descriptions the tendency has on the whole not been bad. It has been pointed out that the Maikop field will for some time to come confine itself to the home market, which is highly protected, and therefore not directly concerned with the oil war. True, the Maikop companies have their eye upon eventually becoming big exporters, but meantime the Shell and Standard Oil groups in cutting prices are playing the game for Maikop, because low prices will greatly stimulate and extend the use of oil fuel. Kern Oils have remained flat, and one shareholder has been advocating the appointment of an investigation into the company's affairs. It seems a little early to do this, but having regard to the way in which official estimates of production have been falsified the restiveness of the shareholders is not to be wondered at. The Kern may be a good enough property, but I cannot resist the feeling that the company has a bigger burden of capital than it ought to have been made to bear. My readers will recollect the striking comparison of capitals and outputs I made some weeks ago between the Kern and another neighbouring enterprise—the California Oilfields, Limited.

The Anglo-South American Bank, whose shares I included in a list of eligible bank investments on September 21, has, considering the depression in Chili, kept up its profits in very fine fashion. The net revenue came out at £178,600, against £181,600 for 1908-9. The bank is applying £21,000 to writing down the capital employed in Chili to the basis of 14d. per dollar, and is putting £30,000 to reserve, raising the total reserve to £830,000. The dividend for the year is 10 per cent., against 9½ per cent. for 1908-9, and the carry forward is increased by £4,200 to a sum of £48,500. The outlook in Argentina is now good, and there are also signs of improvement in Chili. Consequently, there is reason to look for a growth in the profits of the bank.

A. and F. Pears, the well-known soap manufacturers, have been handicapped for some years by high prices of raw materials. This drawback is still operating, and it is therefore the more welcome to report that the decline in profit has been arrested. The total net revenue for the year to June 30 last was £66,425, against £58,764 in 1908-9. The ordinary dividend is maintained at 10 per cent., but there is again no allocation to the reserve fund. The company's ordinary shares, yielding 6 per cent. at present price, seem fairly valued. The 6 per cent. cumulative preference are a sound investment to yield 4½ per cent., and the 5 per cent. irredeemable debenture stock looks distinctly attractive. It is amply secured upon property, and its annual interest is covered 6½ times; the yield at current price is £4 6s. 3d. Another industrial investment worth drawing attention to is Baldwins 5½ per cent. £1 preference shares, which give a return at present price of fully 5 per cent. The company, which is a well-known South Wales iron, steel, and colliery concern, has done very well for some years past, and, thanks to conservative management, the financial position is very strong. On the basis of last year's earnings the preference dividend is covered nine times. Further details are to hand regarding the object of the big increase in the capital of Lever Brothers. An additional 70½ acres of freehold land adjoining Port Sunlight have been purchased, and a new soapery and a new oil mill are to be erected there. Three oil mills are also to be erected on the West Coast of Africa, new works at Durban are nearing completion, and land has been secured and arrangements are in progress for the erection of works in France and Japan. The board can hardly be accused of lack of enterprise.

While touching upon industrials, I am reminded of the receipt of a useful little pamphlet giving details of about 100 companies engaged up North in the iron, steel, brewery, electric, and other trades. Mr. Arthur K. Martin, a member of the Newcastle Stock Exchange, is the author and publisher, and he has taken pains to set out profits, dividends, amounts put aside and other vital figures for a number of years, thus affording real help to the would-be investor. His address is Pilgrim House, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and he is making a modest charge of 2s. for his useful little work.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

The One Ship Company.

The dangers of investing money in one ship companies has frequently received practical illustration, but this kind of business is not by any means dead. A case in point has just cropped up in the issue by the Straits of Menai Steamship Company, Limited, of the voyage account covering eleven months of the vessel named the "Straits of Menai." The report states that owing to the heavy losses this steamer has made, and the additional cost of working on account of increasing insurance premiums, etc., together with the great difficulty experienced in finding profitable employment, the company has endeavoured to find a purchaser for the vessel. After considerable difficulty it has obtained and accepted an offer of £10,000, and a meeting is to be called to pass the necessary resolutions for winding up the company. All the shareholders have received in dividends for the past five years has been 10s. per cent. I am informed that the capital was mostly subscribed by working men, and that one man's life savings of £300 have gone, and he is left penniless at the age of sixty-two. The publication of these facts is the best warning I can give against these one ship companies.

Outside Brokers and the Gaming Act.

The Gaming Act was successfully pleaded last week in a case in which a firm of outside brokers sued a customer for differences. The defendant instructed the plaintiffs to purchase certain oil shares for him, and their case was that they sold the shares to him out of a lot which they held and bought them back again at his loss when he failed to provide the cover they required. Judge Lumley Smith remarked that this would not do. "If you employ a broker to buy shares for you," said his Honour, "he cannot sell you his own shares." I quote this because it crystallises a point which many people have a difficulty in understanding—namely, the distinction frequently drawn in the courts between transactions with brokers who are members of the Stock Exchange and those with outside firms. The distinction is based upon the fact that a broker properly so called is an agent who buys or sells for his client, not a principal who sells to or buys from him. On receiving an order to buy or sell shares the Stock Exchange broker, acting on his client's behalf, enters into the requisite contract with one of the dealers on the Stock Exchange who are known as jobbers, and who are prohibited from dealing directly with the public. The broker's only interest in the transaction is his commission. On the other hand, the outsiders who misdescribe themselves as brokers almost invariably deal with their customers as principals, and one result of this is that many of their speculative bargains can be voided by the Gaming Act, though the similar bargains can be legally enforced if carried out through the medium of the Stock Exchange.

A Cool Proposal.

It is tiresome to have to mention Mr. V. Carter West again this week, but the latest move of the London and Provincial Investment Trust, Birkbeck Bank Chambers, makes it necessary to do so in order that the position and status of that concern may be properly appreciated. At the time when the McKinley, Alexander and Sons' bucket-shop, with which Mr. West was closely associated, was unloading on its customers shares in the Consolidated Oilfields of California, one of Mr. West's companies, the London and Provincial Investment Trust was brought into existence by one of Mr. West's colleagues to take a hand in the game. McKinley, Alexander and Sons have now practically closed down their office at Hampden House—a fact of interest to the many dupes whom they have failed to pay—and I am told that the services of the staff have been transferred to the London and Provincial Trust at Birkbeck Bank Chambers. This event has been marked by a new and ingenious departure on the part of the Trust. Turning its attention from oil to rubber shares, it last week issued a circular artfully designed to frighten rubber investors out of their holdings, and offering them its valuable advice free of charge. Enclosed with the circular is a form for the investor to sign and fill up, containing the following paragraphs:—

> I enclose certificates for the above shares.
> Will you please make inquiries about the shares, and if you feel confident that these shares are going to drop and think it advisable to sell, please sell them at the best price possible?

For sheer impudence this proposal would be hard to beat. Investors are often very simple, but, still, it seems almost incredible that any one could be such an unmitigated fool as to hand over his securities to circularisers, of whom he knows nothing beyond the fact that they trade under the title of a Trust.

An Open Exchange.

A new dodge of the man Ashton, alias the Industrial Development Corporation, is revealed by a circular and a booklet entitled "An Open Exchange," which he has addressed to a lady holding some Kern River oil shares. The corporation pretends that it has been "approached by a client" to buy 700 Kern Rivers, and the lady is asked whether she has any to sell, and, if so, at what price. This bit of humbug is meant to impress the lady with the advantages of "Our Open Exchange," which "brings buyer and seller together without the aid of any third or fourth parties." The corporation can be left out of the reckoning because "there are no charges, fees, or remuneration payable by clients." In other words, Ashton puts himself to no end of trouble and expense in order that people may buy and sell shares through the agency of his bucket-shop free, gratis, and for nothing. There's philanthropy for you!

The Charing Cross Bank.

In a "Scrutator" article in this issue of Truth reference is made to the fact that the Charing Cross Bank is now in the hands of the Official Receiver, Mr. Carpenter, the proprietor, having filed a petition in bankruptcy. I mention the fact here as for years past inquirers through "Vigilant's Letter Box" have been warned against this concern.

Cosmopolitan Publications.

The Official Receiver has just issued his report in connection with the compulsory winding up of Cosmopolitan Publications, Limited, the company promoted by the man Delyannis to carry on the sheet known as The Cosmopolitan Financier. There was not a penny to meet unsecured debts amounting to £2,852, such assets as the company possessed being swallowed up by the debenture-holders, and with regard to the share capital the accounts revealed a deficiency of £55,834. This was the result which I predicted when Delyannis was fooling people all over the country with his offers of shares in this concern.

NEW ISSUES.

Subscriptions are invited by the Duff Development Company, Limited, for an issue of £250,000 six per cent. first debenture stock at par. The company, which has an authorised share capital of £700,000, of which £492,470 is issued, was formed in 1903 to acquire and develop concessions in the State of Kelantan, now a Protectorate of the British Government. After redemption of the existing debenture stock the proceeds of this issue will be applied in the general development of the property, including the extension of the rubber plantations. Holders of the stock will have a right to convert into shares on or before October 15, 1917.

The Nagolle (Ceylon) Rubber and Tea Plantations, Limited, has been formed to purchase certain estates situated in the Keloni Valley District, Ceylon, and comprising an area of 2,087 acres, of which 1,726 are planted with rubber, 291 with tea, and 70 acres are reserve land. The number of rubber trees is about 323,800. No cash will be paid to the vendors, the entire purchase price of £135,141 being satisfied by the allotment of shares. The capital of the company is £250,000 in £1 shares, of which 50,000 are now offered for subscription, 64,859 being reserved for future issue. No underwriting commission will be paid, nor have any calls or options on the unissued capital been granted.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of TRUTH.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Nogard.—It is rather hard at present to advise. The possibility of a substantial increase in the bonus leaves scope for a further rise in the shares. On the other hand, traffics in the near future are likely to be only moderate, and may have some effect upon prices. You might perhaps delay selling for the present, and keep a close watch upon the market.

Thor.—The line may turn out all right, but it is at present in the making, and the debentures must be regarded as of a speculative character.

Wun.—You could obtain 4¾ per cent. with very fine security upon Chicago Milwaukee 7 per cent. preferred shares. These would be better than the common shares you name from a strict investment point of view. Willey.—In the circumstances the Chatham debenture stock would be eminently suitable.

Mines.

Abstract.—1. Hold. 2. Probably not before the end of next year. An Old Mug.—Hold in hope of some recovery when general market conditions improve.

Belmont.—1. As you suggest, your money could be more hopefully employed than in these shares. 2. It might be as well to sell on any advance. 3. They seem a fair holding for dividends. Bim.—1 and 2. Might be held for dividends. 3. Sell on a moderate rise.

Cliffe Hydro.—A purchase of the shares must be regarded as a speculation on the chance of their improving with others of the class. Camel.—A further purchase would be likely to turn out satisfactorily in time. Connaught.—1. I see no reason to expect much advance on the present price, and think you might secure the profit. 2. Better not put too much into any one concern. It is impossible for me or anyone else to say what the price will be at the special settlement date. 3. I do not care for them.

Diastase.—I think the shares likely to have some recovery later on, but would put the additional money into something else. D. D.—The reduction of output is disappointing, but the company has a large property, and ere long may be in a position to raise its production again. A reconstruction should not be necessary. I would hold rather than sell at the present low price. 2. Averaging would appear likely to prove profitable in time. 3. Goch and Brakpan.

Etonian.—I should be inclined to select No. 1, as to which see reference in my Notes this week.

Falcon Crag.—1. You might keep those you have, but it would seem as well to put the additional money into something else. 2. In a buoyant market they might recover to your price. 3. A hopeful lock-up.

G. Kutais.—I have not seen a recent price for the shares. Griffin.—The shares are not dealt in on this side, and I have not sufficient information to advise.

H. Y.—I should be inclined to secure the handsome profit and invest the money in something less speculative.

Jinker.—Since writing you have doubtless noticed the article in last week's issue. If you are content to accept reduced dividends for a time you might hold. J. S. C.—In the event of a moderate rally it would be as well to realise. Jean.—Both hopeful lock-up speculations.

Lorenzo.—1. I see no reason to expect much advance. 2. I do not expect an early dividend, but think the shares should be held for a better market. 3. Present price discounts prospects some way ahead.

Moonraker.—You may be able to realise to better advantage in course of the next few months. Mistiti.—1 and 2. In an active market they might have a moderate rally, in which event you had better realise. They are, of course, a speculative holding. 3. I see no reason to expect much advance. Mintesqui.—I have no recent information about either concern. M. D.—It was a bucket-shop promotion, which I severely criticised at the time of issue. Caution is certainly necessary in any dealings you may have with the people concerned.

Timid Contemplation.—Results have not come up to expectations, but I would hold in the hope of an eventual recovery rather than sell at the present price.

Veto.—I see no particular attraction just now in any of the shares named.

Woburn.—Results have not come up to expectations, but I think a purchase at the present price would turn out well in time.

Mixed Securities.

Aconite.—1. It may ultimately turn out all right, but at present must be regarded as a speculative holding; the price already discounts prospects some way ahead. 2. I do not look for an improvement at present. 3. Not a promising holding. I should sell.

Bix.—1. A sound investment, and at the present price the shares are worth holding. I do not, however, regard yours as a case for averaging. 2. No. 3. I do not recommend them. Beard.—Port of London 4 per Cent. B stock, New York Telephone 4½ per Cent. Bonds, and Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per Cent. debenture stock. Bexhill.—1. It is not a first-class holding, but might be held for the present. 2 and 3. Both well secured.

Care.—1. It all depends on how the programme is carried out. At present I do not care to take responsibility for recommending them. 2. Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per cent. debenture stock and Lever Bros. A preference. 3. City of London 4 per cent. debenture stock.

Dubois.—1. Excellent. 2. A sound share. 3. I would not disturb so secure an investment.

Figaro.—1. Wit. Deep appear a good holding. 2. The news you mention is certainly disappointing, but I would hold in hope of some recovery rather than sell now. 3. I cannot say. F. E. W.—I do not care particularly for either.

Helen.—1. I do not look for any material decline. 2. The stock is a safe investment. 3. Not at the present price. You might get rid of 5 and 6, which are of a speculative character, and put the money into something more secure. See recommendations in article of September 28. I do not regard 4 as specially attractive.

Quorn.—They are all six very sound securities, and I should hold the lot. The land shares have the greatest scope for ultimate expansion, and No. 4 is also talked higher.

Rush.—1. To what do you refer as Mexican Prior Lien Railway? If you mean the prior lien bonds of the National Railways of Mexico, I have many times expressed a good opinion of them. 2. No. 3. They should turn out all right, but at present the line is still very much in the making. At best there is not much scope for improvement in them. Ricardo.—1 and 2. Sell them. 3. Better put it in the Post Office Savings Bank.

Somerset.—1. See list given in an article headed "Investments for Women" on September 28. The stocks are just as well suited to male investors in search of 4 to 5 per cent. 2. There is no promise of redemption at par in 1923; the Government simply has the option to do so, and you may take it that the option will not be exercised. 3. Get "Cordingley's Guide to the Stock Exchange," 2s., Effingham Wilson, 54, Threadneedle Street, E.C. Sugra.—New York Telephone 4½ per cent. bonds, Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per cent. debenture stock, Cunard 4½ per cent. debenture stock, and Chicago Milwaukee 7 per cent. preferred.

Taken In.—1. Some recovery is not unlikely to occur sooner or later, but I would not buy more. 2. You paid a high price. Better hold, in the hopes of a recovery later on.

Vanduara.—1. A sound share, but the market is at present in a disturbed condition, and you may possibly be able to buy cheaper by waiting. 2. It is impossible to estimate the life of such a mine, and the shares do not strike me as being particularly cheap. 3. Very much of a gamble.

Rubber.

A Constant Reader.—An excellent list. Hold them all. Acid Drop.—Both good holdings. The dividends should increase, but you must not look for any great capital appreciation. Arts.—In good hands, but Taiping is a better property, and at the same price I should make the exchange. Anxious (Stroud Green).—1. Hold Beverley. 2. Good speculative holding. Should develop next year. 3. Hardly worth selling at present price, but I have very little confidence in the concern. Acme.—A Malayan company would give better results. Sell when you can do so without loss. A. Batley.—1 and 2. First-class. May safely be held for good dividends. 3. Annual report should reach you at the end of this month. Write again after it is issued. Anlegung.—1. A good speculative purchase. 2. Present time favourable. 3. Yes; but they are now 15s. paid. Anxious (Plympton).—1. A reasonable chance if markets are active. 2. Should turn out well. Ad.—Limit was too high. Subsidiary will be floated as soon as markets are favourable. Write again then. Accountant.—1. Soundly managed. No need for anxiety, but profits depend largely upon market activity. Hold until end of year. 2. The options will have little or no market value until the shares touch par. 3. I think so. Abel.—1. Add 50 per cent. to each for your purpose. 2. Very good. Abbot.—1. Worth holding for capital appreciation. 2. Taiping. Abbotsford.—1. Great possibilities. Worth holding, but no dividend just yet. 2. Take any profit you can get. I criticised the issue on flotation, and have not altered my opinion. 3. Sell d. Hold the others. Apt.—Malacca management was at fault, but I think the worst is known, and a steady recovery should follow the increasing outputs. 2. Tangoel prospectus estimates were too high. Worth present price. 3. Worth holding.

Boylan.—Hold for market improvement. A first-class share. Quite sound on a seven years' purchase basis. Investments in low-priced shares of moderately capitalised companies whose estates are being soundly and rapidly developed are, however, likely, within the next year or two, to show greater capital appreciation, and if you desire this you might watch for an opportunity to exchange this autumn. Blake (Ashford).—Pleased to hear you did well. Many thanks for information. Bo (Kenilworth).—Central Sumatra has no Para rubber at present, and the market doubts whether the Rambong estimates will be realised. Large estate, but the rent is a handicap. Watch for opportunity to sell. Bim.—1. Good speculative possibilities. Expect no immediate rise. 2. Should steadily improve. May earn a dividend next year. 3. Poor outlook. Sell when you can. Blinker.—1. Sell if they go over 25s. 2. The premium is too high for safety. 3. Prefer Inch Kenneth at 13. Dividend 50 per cent. paid last month. Buy Kajang also. Bootalia.—See Rule 2. As to Nos. 1, 2, and 12, see reply to "Boylan." The others may be held for improvement. Golden Hope dividend paid October 15. Bosquet.—1. See full reply to "A" on October 5. A statement is to be issued very shortly. Reports from the estate are satisfactory. 2. Cannot say. 3. Year closes December 31. Accounts in April. 4. Market dullness only cause. Profit varies. 5. They were too high. Look for substantial recovery.

Chaman.—Sporting of you. Do as you suggest with Nos. 1 and 6, but watch No. 1 for profit-taking later. Confidence.—1. Yes. 2. Very good speculative possibilities. Cannon.—A very good list. As to Nos. 1, 4, 5, and 9, see reply to "Boylan." Increase your holding of No. 7. C. Bailey.—The advice I suspect emanates from an outside broker, who wishes you to sell in order that he may obtain business. I should not sell (a) at present. Next year it should develop well. Both (b) and (c) are good holdings. Cot.—(a) Last year's dividend was 17½ per cent. (b) No. 53,760 lbs. 1911 crop sold at 11s. per lb. (c) Medium. (d) Worth holding. (e) 29,850 lbs. for three months.

Doctor.—Not over-speculative at present prices. No. 3 is worth averaging. Hold the others, and buy Taiping. Doubtful.—Sale prices not yet announced, and meeting not yet fixed. Position seems sound enough. Public apathy cause of dullness, and I am afraid we must wait. Dartmoor.—I quite agree. The liability to calls is a deterrent. No immediate developments until next year. Averaging will probably be advisable later. Duncan.—1. See reply to "Dartmoor." 2. See reply to "Arts." 3. Hold. Dunvegan.—1. (a) Yes. (b) and (c) Depends upon market activity. 2. A good lock-up. 3. Prefer United Serdang.

Evelyn.—1. Taiping, Ceylon Timber and Rubber, and Bukit Mertajam. 2. Sell when you can. Esor.—Taiping or Siak. Ealing.—Hold them all for the present, but you hold too many speculative shares. Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 8 are good. Nos. 3 and 6 are good speculative holdings. No. 7 should develop next year.

Flagmark.—1. See reply to "Boylan." 2. I think so, but realisation of estimate depends upon price of rubber. Freda.—Hold a and b for profit, but disregard limit. As to c see reply to "Arts." Francis.—1. Market conditions. Shipments are satisfactory. 2 and 3. Good speculative holdings. Folly.—Yes. Average as you suggest.

Gums.—As to 1 and 6 see reply to "Boylan." Hold the others. Ginger.—1. Langkat Sumatra. 2. Under 3. 3. Six per cent. paid last April. May be 20 per cent. next year. 4. Management has been disappointing. Look for improvement. Gums.—1. Sell at first favourable opportunity. 2. In good hands, but profits depend on market activity. 3. Yes. Travancore Rubber Company, Limited, is the full title. Price 4½. Greville.—Not a bad speculation. Gurkha.—Sorry I misunderstood The reference in Rubber Notes to the Rubber Trust new issue did not refer to the shares you hold. Your company is in excellent hands, and should certainly share in any market revival. A good holding. 2. Yes. I look for appreciation in both, but cannot fix selling limits in these dull markets. 3. Quite a good purchase at the price. Tapping commenced in June.

Hong Kew. 1. I have a high opinion of Gula Kalumpong. 2. Now at a discount, but worth holding. Hal.—1. No great prospects. Sell as you suggest. 2. See reply to "Arts." 3. Await further news from the estate. Had.—Heawood is high enough as a rubber proposition. I cannot advise on tin. Hormuzd.—1. Disappointing, but hold for a year, and you should see your price again. 2. Outlook is improving. 3. Certainly hold. 4. Hold for better prices. 5. It still allows a good margin of profit for well managed companies.

Invicta.—1. Taiping issued capital £195,000. Under option £15,000. Total acreage, 5,332; planted, 1,990 acres. 2. Sapong has good prospects. Ingram.—Your limits are very reasonable in view of altered outlook.

Juvenis.—Averaging is effected by making a further purchase at a price lower than that of the original purchase, thus reducing the average cost of the whole. Jebong.—Gedong (Perak) is a sound holding, but Jebong is a Ceylon rupee company, as to which I cannot advise. Merlimau is quite good, but I have a poor opinion of Atherfield. Jequie.—As a promising speculation you might average as you suggest. J. Fitzgerald (Co. Cork).—1. Yes. Merlimau is a good purchase. 2. Cannot say. 3. Should earn a dividend in 1912. By the way, your letter was addressed to Truth, Dublin, but it was duly delivered here.

Kat.—I believe some experimental tapping has been done. Hold Merlimau. Sell the other. Kamlan.—Thanks for enclosure. The game is pretty clear. The raw rubber position is improving. America disappointed us, but better times will come.

Lukut.—1. Yes. 2. Fair. Liverpool.—1. Look for recovery. 2. Worth averaging, but you might exchange later for a Malayan company. 3. The shipments are encouraging Looe.—1. Yes. 2. Worth present price. 3. Cannot trace. Lanka.—I value the opinions of Mr. Arbuthnot and Mr. Copeman as to the prospects of early revival. Nos. 1 and 2 are good speculative holdings. Nos. 3 and 4 are sound shares well worth holding for steady appreciation. Sell Nos. 5 and 6 when they show you a profit. Larko.—I cannot recommend Nos. 1 and 2. No. 3 may be held for your figure.

Myfanwy.—Hold for substantial improvement, but prospects depend largely on market activity. Mrs. Conceit.—1. Hold until outlook improves. 2. Bukit Mertajam is good, but I have a poor opinion of the other. Man.—I see no advantage in the suggested exchange.

Nestor.—a. See reply last week. Take advantage of any revival to sell No. 1. Hold Nos. 2 and 3 for a profit. b. Reinvest in Glen Bervie, Bandar Sumatra, Lumut. c. Both deserve place in list. Lumut, say, 10. Cannot give definite figure for No. 6. Nogard.—1. They should turn out well at your prices. 2. Yes. Lock them up. Taiping is the better property. Take any good profit on Tempeh. 3. Should rubber sell at 2s. per lb. net profit when the estates are in full bearing Taiping might pay 60 per cent. and Tempeh 50 per cent.

Oke.—1. Good speculative holding. 2 and 4. Sell at first reasonable opportunity. 3. Hold.

Profits.—1. Hold for a profit. 2. Well worth holding. 3. Limit too high, but look for recovery. 4. Hold for steady improvement. 5. Depends entirely on market activity. Good speculative holding. 6. A sound lock-up. Progress.—No. 3 is good. The others might be worth buying at par, but I should prefer Taiping. Pagang.—1. Depends largely on purity and method of preparation. Prospectus estimates based upon selling price of 4s. per lb. 2. Market inactivity. 3. The time allowed for payment of a call—usually twenty-one days from date of notice—is fixed by the company's articles, and not by law. Pence.—No. Bukit Kajang is not identical with Kajang. The latter is an Inch Kenneth subsidiary, and is quoted in Edinburgh. Peter.—Hold No. 3. You have a nice profit on No. 2, and on any market improvement I should sell this. Also sell No. 1 at your price. Re-invest in Langkat Sumatra, Tremelbye, and Taiping. See reply to "Boylan."

Quetta.—1. Good speculative holding, but profits depend on market activity. 2. Sempah has good prospects. Now quoted ¼ premium. Quidnunc.—See reply to "Boylan." Sell No. 1 at anything over 50s. Reinvest in cheaper shares. Hold the others.

Racing.—Well worth holding. Red Lion.—An interesting comparison. You shall be the judge. Regent.—1. Tremelbye, Langkat Sumatra, and Taiping. 2. I should not select it. 3. In excellent hands, but prospects depend upon market activity. Rex.—1. Not over-valued at present price. 2. Buy Taiping instead. 3. Both worth averaging. Roddy.—1. The company is sound enough, and its prospects are good. But rubber is selling at a lower figure, hence the change of opinion. 2. A good holding for steady appreciation. Not advisable to fix limit at present.

Sandy.—If the lady signed one of the usual forms of application to the directors for an allotment I am afraid she will be bound to take the shares, in spite of the letter from the editor of the bucket-shop journal through whom the application was forwarded. There might be a remedy against this individual, but as to this a solicitor should be consulted. S. C. Raffles.—Many thanks. The comments are somewhat bitter, and I doubt whether publication would help matters. Sted.—1. Good speculative holding. See reply to "Roddy." 2. Await expert's detailed report. Simon.—1. Selaba is a good holding. 2. Rubana was floated on a reasonable valuation, but few shares were allotted to the public, and the premium was excessive. Take advantage of any rise to realise. Slateford.—All good. I wish I could say when the rise will come. Saundersfoot.—Johore Rubber Lands—the fully paid issue—Bandjarsarie, and Taiping. Southport.—Both very speculative. Take a profit when you see it. For present purchase I prefer Taiping.

Temoc.—1. Varies according to district, but the average is 3s. per lb. 2. Forty years or more. 3. No. 4. I do not recommend it. 5. Good speculative possibilities. 6. Good. Tabloid.—1. Yes. They should steadily recover. 2. Should earn a dividend next year. 3. 1912. 4. Is now collecting balata. Rubber tapping commences next year. Timid Contemplation.—1. Wait for demonstration to shareholders, and then write again. 2. Yes. The shipments are encouraging. Look for recovery. Tyltyl.—Hold them all for the present. When No. 5 touches your price again exchange for a lower priced share.

Vopros.—Hold them all for steady improvement. Val d'Or.—All should gradually appreciate to your figure. Cannot fix date. Vicarious.—1. If dividend estimates are realised 8 per cent. for this year. See reply to "Boylan" as to this and Nos. 2 and 3. Vibgyor.—1. Market inactivity only cause. Quality satisfactory, and the Guiguet machines are working well. 2. Not yet announced. 3. Yes. 4. No. Viridian.—A good idea. As to No. 2 see reply to "Boylan." Hold the others.

William.—Taiping, Ceylon Timber and Rubber, and either of the two you mention. Walla.—1. Yes. Hold. 2. Look for steady improvement. Cannot fix amount. 3. I do not like German East African estates, but Lewa is one of the best. Do not place too much reliance on prospectus estimates. 4. Both good. Say, Sempah. Wallaby.—1 and 2. Both worth averaging. I prefer No. 1. 3. Taiping, or for dividends, Langkat Sumatra.

X. Y. Z.—1. The United Malaysian company was grossly over-capitalised. 2. Sell at first reasonable opportunity. 3. Glen Bervie. Taiping.

Zur.—1. Average c, d, h, and l. 2. i and k are the weakest. Watch for an opportunity to sell. Look for improvement in a. Next year b should develop well. Hold the others. 3. I think so.

Miscellaneous.

August.—I do not recommend them. Alpha.—The company appears to be making solid progress, and in time the shares should see a higher price. Apol.—Have nothing to do with Litvin and Co. The current market price of the bond for which they ask you to pay £5 10s. is only £4. A. J. S.—I do not care much for 1. My opinion of 2 and 3 remains favourable; the latter is the more secure investment, as the lower yield suggests. Aloes.—1. Better leave them alone for the present, though in the event of any sharp fall they would be worth picking up. 2. Keep the shares you hold; a further purchase would be all right providing you are not sinking an undue amount in the concern. A. G.—The property came out under good auspices, and the shares might be held until the company has had a chance of showing what it can do. Aries.—They should be nearing the end of the preliminary work by now. Of course, the heaviness of the capital will always militate against substantial dividends. Anti-Sharper.—1. Obviously you would be getting 6 per cent. on the amount you invested. 2. On your bald statement it is quite impossible to say whether "there is a screw loose"; but probably there is nothing unusual or unreasonable in the delay.

Blanchette.—Thanks; see note in another column as to the Industrial Development Corporation. Bengal.—I regard Nos. 4 and 5 as the pick. Beta.—As a speculation the preference seem worth attention.

Claremont B.—The National Share Exchange and all such bucket-shops make their own gains out of the losses of their guileless customers. I do not recommend any outside brokers. Do your business through a member of the Stock Exchange. Cautious.—I do not know that they have ever refused to pay, but unless you want an object-lesson in the working of a system devised to make profits for the bucket-shop (such profits being, of course, the losses of their customers) you had better leave it alone. Thanks for the information in your P.S. Cambridge.—1. Not a concern I recommend. Put your money into one of the well-known old-established banks. 2. This so-called bank has just gone into the Bankruptcy Court. 3. You ought to have received the share certificates long before this. Ask for them.

Diego.—Keep the bonds for developments. The financial power of the syndicate which is attempting to arrive at a settlement makes the chances in favour of the option to buy out the bondholders at 15 being exercised. Diddled.—1. The statement was grossly misleading. 2. I am afraid not; but you should ask the liquidator. 3. The insurance company, which is one of the highest standing, was not in any way responsible for the misrepresentation.

Ethel B.—Neither safe. Most ordinary shares are more or less speculative. Read article of September 28, which contained a carefully prepared list of suitable stocks.

Gunner.—It is an important concern, and the shares ought to be worth taking up. But at present only debentures are being offered to the public, so that there is no market for the shares.

Ignoramus.—I presume that it is as a joke that you ask my opinion. The prospectus is a manifest absurdity from a business point of view. Investor.—Your question is answered by the news of the failure of the so-called bank.

J. R. E.—It is of a speculative type, and unless you care to take a fair amount of risk, better cut the loss. J. E. H.—Thanks for circular. Jag.—1. Leave it to the Canadians. Really "good things" are not offered in that way. 2. Certainly should not buy.

Lascelles.—1. Hold. 2. Impossible to say, but they seem a fair industrial holding. Long Loch.—If you mean the Anglo-American Investment Trust, it is a bucket-shop against which I uttered a warning only a week ago.

Mintisque.—Thanks. It will be referred to in "Entre Nous."

Prospector.—At present I cannot take the responsibility of recommending it. What you say as to the opening for such an institution is true, but there is always the danger that the advice given may become, directly or indirectly, self-interested, as in the case of the other concerns you mention.

Quadrant.—I believe so, but, anyhow, the fact that it is distributed gratuitously and carries out speculative transactions with its readers shows what sort of a publication it is.

Rules.—The company has done well for some years, and I think you ought to keep the shares. Reliable Investment.—Baldwin's preference, referred to in this week's article, answers pretty closely to your requirements.

Villiers.—Sell.

Walsall.—Obviously its position depends mainly upon the correctness of the valuations of property, investments, etc., as certified by the directors. As to the ability and trustworthiness of these local gentlemen, you are better able to judge than I am; but the deposits are certainly very heavy, and if in any doubt at all you should withdraw. Wallaby.—Thanks. I will make inquiries about them. W.—They have fallen in sympathy with high-class stocks generally. Competition or no competition, the company's debenture stock is as safe as anything you could wish, and it would be a pity to sell.

Yorkey.—1. Have nothing to do with it. 2-3. I think you must have made a mistake in the name of the concern through which you bought the shares; repeat it with the address.

VIGILANT.

INSURANCE.

MY usual article under this heading is unavoidably held over; but below I give answers to a number of inquiries on the subject of insurance. Correspondents desiring to make similar inquiries should enclose with their letters a coupon cut from the third page of the coloured cover of Truth:—

Russ.—Commercial Union or Norwich Union Life. Green Howard.—You need have no fears about the Australian company you mention; it is entirely safe and sound. I believe the other office you name is quite all right, but I have no recent information in regard to it. Brandon.—The office which has been recommended to you for annuities is a thoroughly good one, especially for such a purpose. Without knowing age and sex I cannot say whether you could do slightly better elsewhere. Bo (Kenilworth).—I greatly doubt whether the shares you mention are worth holding. Perhaps Messrs. Maclean and Henderson of Stirling could sell them for you. Tinsukia.—The policy you ask about is a quite good one, and the company is sound. S. and Co.—No. 1 is about the worst of the recognised companies. No. 2 is very fairly good and likely to improve. No. 3 is better left alone altogether. T. R. H.—Had you not gone to India within two years of effecting your assurance you could have gone at any later time without paying an extra premium; but as you went within the two years you are liable to pay the extra so long as you reside in India, subject to abatement for any lengthened period you spend in England. I cannot see that you have any claim against the company. W.—Unless you have reason to believe that the assured under the two policies is likely to die soon I do not think you would be wise to purchase the policies. I certainly do not think it would pay you to give so high a price as the surrender value quoted by the company. Grannie.—The policy you contemplate taking is a good one, and the company is quite sound. Combined.—You can safely take the policy you contemplate, feeling sure that the terms are fair and the company safe. John O'Neill.—The office you ask about is absolutely sound and strong, and for many purposes is one of the best in existence. Major (Malwa).—The company is entirely within its rights in declining to renew your policy, or issue a fresh one to you, and in no circumstances could they be expected to state their reasons for the course adopted. Erin.—There is something wrong about the figures you give for the twenty-payment life policy in the Clergy Mutual. The policies in this society and in the London Life are excellent. The third policy is a good deal less attractive. Manifestly the interest on £500, even without any profits at all, will much more than suffice to pay premiums, which will not amount to more than about £13 a year after twenty-five years from now.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

GREAT COBAR, LIMITED.

The third annual general meeting of the shareholders in the Great Cobar, Limited, was held on the 12th inst. at River Plate House, London, Mr. Andrew Haes (the chairman) presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said: The report will have given the shareholders a very clear idea of the position in which the board found itself at the commencement of the period under review, and the interim report clearly shows the improved position we are in at present, and is a fair forecast of the immediate future. All work on the property is progressing satisfactorily, and every day is adding to the efficiency of the plant and the smooth working of the general business of this very large undertaking. Diamond drilling operations were commenced in the Cobar mine in April last, and have shown very satisfactory results, proving that pay ore exists to far greater width than was heretofore believed, and they will be energetically proceeded with. It is also intended to explore the Chesney and Peak mines in the same manner. The main shaft is being pushed down, and new levels will be opened at each 150 ft. Each level so opened adds, roughly, some 600,000 tons to the reserves. The ore reserves to-day amount to 3,127,000 tons, having a total value of a little under 3 per cent. of copper and a recoverable value at the furnaces of 2½ per cent., making a total of about 75,000 tons of copper recoverable, to which figure must be added a value of equal to £25 per ton of precious metals—a very important item for you to consider. These reserves, compared with the reserves when the property was first taken over in 1906, show an increase of over 1,000,000 tons. This increase, taking the costs ruling in the past, when the old plant was being operated, would alone show a large increase of visible profits, and the results should prove much more favourable with the largely reduced costs as treated by the present plant. Since our last general meeting you all know we have acquired the Cobar gold mine. Shareholders must not think, however, that owing to the acquisition of the Cobar gold mine our Chesney mine is put on the shelf. The working of the three mines together means that we shall only draw roughly one-half the quantity of Chesney ore previously used; but taking the ore in sight in the two silicious ore bodies of the Chesney and Cobar gold mines together only gives us the fair proportion necessary to the treatment of the developed basic ores of the Great Cobar mine. The chairman went on to refer to the labour difficulties in New South Wales in the coal districts, which commenced at the end of October in the year under review, and which deprived them of two full months' working, and in conclusion said: The company is now in the position which the board confidently believed it to have been in eighteen months ago. Our smelters are now running smoothly, and have demonstrated that they are capable of treating the tonnage we have aimed at. There is no doubt also that the mines are able to supply that tonnage, and the board believe that the anticipation so often expressed will now be fully realised.

The report was adopted, and a resolution was afterwards passed authorising the board to increase the capital to £1,000,000 by the creation of 30,000 additional shares of £5 each.

MOUNT YAGAHONG EXPLORATION AND FINANCE CO., LIMITED.

The sixth ordinary general meeting was held on the 11th inst. at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., Mr. Alan Cadell, C.S.I., J.P., presiding.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said a noticeable alteration on the liabilities side was an increase of something like £6,000 in the share capital, which was attributable partly to the issue of new shares on the reorganisation and partly to the taking up of old shares at a premium before the date fell due. Of the contingent liabilities of £3,625, nearly £3,000 had since been called up. Referring to the assets, the item of shares, debentures and other interest at or below cost, £47,138, showed an increase of nearly £12,000 on the previous year. The market valuation of those shares quoted in the market amounted to nearly £60,000, and over and above this there was a large number of shares, interest and options which stood at little or no cost in the balance-sheet. On the other side of the profit and loss account there was a gross profit of £14,384 16s. 3d. The company continued to hold a very high opinion of their investments in the Middleburg Steam Coal and Coke Company, and they were ready when a suitable opportunity occurred to increase their holding in that company, which had made something like £20,000 profit. Their interests in the Rubber market had resulted in the pleasant fact that they had actually got back all the money invested, and they had all their shares and other interests for practically nothing. In Kinta Kellas they had still a large option, and the rubber output of that company looked like being 30 to 50 per cent. in excess of the prospectus estimate.

Mr. A. T. Macer, replying to questions, said with regard to the suggestion that they should pay an interim dividend, he would point out that the shareholders were receiving 12½ per cent., and since the close of the financial year they had earned £12,000. As regards the money in the bank, it was solely owing to the fact of their having money in the bank that they were able to secure such interests as that in the Doranakande Company which would earn them 12 per cent. to 15 per cent. on the money invested. They were getting a run for their money in the Star of the East at no cost to themselves, and there seemed a chance of that company recovering lost ground and the shareholders getting back the money they had lost. They had in the Middleburg an interest of something like £50,000, which was a backbone for any company. If their company wound up to-morrow, for every pound of capital in the Mount Yagahong the Middleburg asset would give a distribution of 22s. 6d. per share. Then, with regard to the suggestion that they were speculating in rubber and other things, they had not speculated at all. Their other interests had all been carefully selected and had been brought out by people in whom they had every confidence.

The report was adopted unanimously.

MIDDLEBURG STEAM COAL AND COKE COMPANY, LIMITED.

The annual general meeting of the shareholders in the Middleburg Steam Coal and Coke Company, Limited, was held on the 11th inst. at Winchester House, London, Mr. Alan Cadell, C.S.I. (the chairman), presiding.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, stated that they had a very satisfactory year's trading, and that, looking at the progressive expansion of their profits during the last four years, the directors considered that their policy of equipping their colliery with every possible labour-saving appliance had been justified by results. Their profits had increased from £5,929 in 1907 to £19,750 last year, while the coal sales for the former year were 209,680 tons, and last year they were 194,200 tons, so that on an output of coal which was 7½ per cent. less they were making nearly three and a-half times the profit they were making four years ago. The result of the year's working was that they paid their debenture interest and their preference dividend; they had written off for depreciation £3,269; they had paid out of profit some £1,200 of expenditure in getting rid of the short-date debenture issue; and this left them with sufficient to pay a dividend of 6 per cent., to start a reserve fund with £2,500, and to increase the carry forward by £1,686.

Mr. Alfred T. Macer (managing director), in seconding the motion, said that during last year the power scheme inaugurated in the Transvaal came into working. The fear in the coal trade had been that during the early years of working the power scheme the demand for coal would be lessened, and with competition the price of coal might go to a low figure, and that few collieries would be working at a profit. He did not share that view, and he was very glad to say that the view he took had been borne out by the results. The power schemes had steam-driven plants, and each plant meant a considerable demand for coal. The figures with regard to the first six months of the current year, from January 1 to June 30, when power schemes were in operation, were, he thought, very reassuring. The previous half-year showed that the Associated collieries of the Transvaal, of which they were members, sold 1,034,000 tons of coal, whereas in the half-year ended June 30 last they sold 1,118,000 tons, an increase, notwithstanding the working of the power schemes, of 84,000 tons, or 8 per cent. This increase was brought about notwithstanding the fact that this half-year was the lowest half-year with regard to the consumption of house coal. The increase of 8 per cent. was therefore satisfactory. He thought that, on the whole, they would have the same price for coal in the ensuing five years as they had in the last year, and that they could count upon a profit of 2s. 4d. to 2s. 6d. per ton for each ton of their output of coal. With regard to their oil-shale venture, the consumption of the products of oil-shale in the Transvaal was very great; and they had the satisfaction of knowing that their property, if it were possible to organise a shale industry, was the best one and the only one so far proved upon which the chances of success were great.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

TAIPING RUBBER PLANTATIONS, LIMITED.

The statutory meeting was held on the 12th inst. at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., Colonel Ivor Philipps, D.S.O., M.P., presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said:—Gentlemen,—The issue, as you know, was very largely over-subscribed. The issue was of 915,000 shares of 2s. each, or £91,500, and the whole of this amount, with the exception of about £500, has been paid up. It has been arranged that the company shall take over the estates as from August 1 last, but the transfers have not yet been completed. According to the latest advices, everything is now in order, and the transfer is only delayed pending the receipt of the power of attorney of one of the vendors who is in India. Mr. J. W. Campbell, who has managed the St. John's estate under the direction of the present owners, has been appointed manager, and the services of the two assistant managers have been retained. Mr. Campbell is an experienced planter, and was formerly in the Government Botanical Bureau, and he has special experience in the tapping and preparing of rubber. A temporary factory has been erected and will fill the requirements of the company for the next two years, after which it will serve as a rice godown or store. In the meantime a suitable site will be selected and a permanent factory built, capable of dealing with the large production of rubber contemplated from the estates. The only trouble with which the company is confronted is the difficulty of securing adequate labour force. No efforts are being spared to increase the force on the estate, and it is the intention of the directors to engage a European doctor, and in other ways to make the estates attractive to the coolies. The output of dry rubber for the month of August was 1,700 lbs., and for September 2,200 lbs., while the estimate for October is 2,500 lbs., and from the information at our disposal the board have reason to believe that Mr. Boyd's estimate of 55,000 lbs. for the first year will be fully justified by the result of the year's tapping. Mr. Rose informs us that he is confident that it will be exceeded. He is an experienced planter, and is a very large shareholder in the company. It may be mentioned that Mr. Boyd's estimate of the yield of rubber, as published in the prospectus, covered only the production from the St. John's estate, and does not take into account the production which may be looked for from the St. Andrew's and St. Patrick's estates during the years covered by the figures. We believe that you will have in these estates a very valuable property. When we first took up this proposition we believed that we had a very good business, and everything that we had seen or heard of the property justifies the opinion which we first formed of it. A telegram which was received yesterday reads as follows :—"Taiping Rubber Plantations, August, 1,700 lbs. dry rubber; September, 2,200 lbs. Estimate for October, 2,500 lbs. New factory erected in capital working order. Labour supply is increasing; clearing making as much progress as can fairly be expected. Transfer expected to be completed this month."

SPASSKY COPPER MINE.

The fifth annual general meeting of the Spassky Copper Mine, Limited, was held yesterday at the Great Eastern Hotel, E.C., Mr. Arthur Fell, M.P., the chairman, presiding.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that during the first half of the year—from October, 1903, to March, 1909—the company was still engaged in reorganisation, and it was only during the latter part of the year that regular and profitable production was possible. The net profit in Siberia for the whole year was £28,839, which, after deduction of debenture interest, European expenses, etc., left a net credit balance of £9,522. The item of loans, £50,000, had now disappeared, and there were no liabilities beyond debentures and current accounts, while the cash in London exceeded £50,000, and the cash in Russia, with the value of copper in process of realisation, was about £60,000. The stocks on hand were nearly £80,000. Part of it was bar copper at selling price, but the most important items were coal and sundry ores, which exceeded £52.000. In all the circumstances there was no reason to be dissatisfied with a result for a period which was one of reorganisation and reconstruction during its first portion, which had enabled them on an average monthly production of under 140 tons of copper to pay all expenses and make a net profit. Between October and June more copper had been produced than during the whole of the previous twelve months, while the cost of production in Siberia had been reduced from about £60 to under £40 per ton. The increase of production and decrease in costs was by no means ended. When the second Bessemer converter was at work, the manager expected to increase the output to about 300 tons per month, with a further considerable increase during next year. They had about 15,000 tons of first-class ore delivered and stocked at the smelters, which insured the output during the winter and made transport difficulties almost negligible. They had no reason to regret the decision not to build the railway between Spassky and Yuspenssky. At the Yuspenssky Mine progress had been exceedingly satisfactory. Two new levels at 420 ft. and 40 ft. were capable of supplying the smelters for some years to come on a larger basis of production than had yet been attempted, taking only the high grade sulphide ore into account. A small unit of oil concentrated plant had been sent to Spassky with a view to testing its capacity for the concentration of lower grade ores. The property was nearly 120 square miles, and besides the Yuspenssky Mine included copper, coal, iron, stone, clay, limestone, and other deposits, and there were one or two points to which increasing attention would be devoted as time went on. Next year systematic exploration would be made to discover an extension of the Yuspenssky ore body. With regard to the company's position in South-West Siberia, there could be little doubt this district was highly mineralised, and was likely to become one of the great copper-producing centres of the world. The contents of the Karagandy coalfield were estimated at well over four thousand million tons, and if and when the steppies became the centre of a large population this asset would be of great value. The directors had decided to pay an interim dividend of 2s. 6d. per share. The report and accounts were unanimously adopted, and the usual formal business transacted.

PREMIER ELECTRIC THEATRES.

The statutory meeting of the members of the Premier Electric Theatres, Limited, was held on the 12th inst., at Holborn Viaduct Hotel, Holborn Viaduct, E.C., Alderman Frederick Motson Thompson, J.P. (chairman of the company), presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said : I have much pleasure in being able to inform you that your directors have every reason to be satisfied with the present position and prospects of the company. The prospectus of the company was dated December 7, and on December 26 our first theatre was opened, we having acquired a long lease of the Constitutional Hall, Harlesden, which was entirely redecorated and refurnished in the short space of one week, and opened under the name of the Premier Electric Theatre. I am pleased to tell you that it has now obtained a high reputation in the neighbourhood, with the result that on every Saturday evening hundreds of people are turned away owing to the present capacity of the theatre being insufficient. Our Harringay Theatre, which was opened on April 18 last, has proved a great success, it being no uncommon thing on a Saturday evening for quite a houseful of people to be turned away for whom it is impossible to find room. The same remarks also apply to our Leytonstone Theatre, last week being a record week, and, as usual, large numbers of intending patrons could not be accommodated owing to lack of space on Saturday; this week bids fair to again beat the record. Our Earlsfield Theatre, which is situated in a poorer district, although not earning quite such large profits, has proved eminently successful, and I am pleased to tell you that the combined weekly profits of the four theatres, after paying all expenses of every kind, are now, I estimate, sufficient to return dividends of 20 per cent. upon the capital issued. We have, however, thought it wiser to extend our operations rather than to consider at present any distribution of profits, and we have obtained advances from our bankers, on the security of the theatres already erected, to enable us to proceed with the erection of four other theatres at Ilford, East Ham, Woolwich, and Finchley. There four theatres are now in course of construction, and it is hoped they will be open to the public before Christmas. You will remember upon the issue of the company particulars were given of twelve sites which the directors had the option of acquiring or refusing, upon which it was proposed to erect theatres. This programme depended for its accomplishment upon the whole of the £50,000 capital being subscribed. As a matter of fact, the sum in round figures of only £20,000 was available; with this, and by means of advances made by our bankers upon the security of the buildings erected, you will now, within twelve months of the incorporation of the company, be the owners of eight high-class up-to-date electric theatres, with total accommodation for upwards of 8,000 persons. As I have already stated, I estimate we are at the present time earning 20 per cent. upon the capital issued, and before the end of the year your board have every reason to believe profits will be doubled. We hope with your approval and support within the next three months to add four more theatres to our circuit, making twelve in all, as the result of which we should obtain profits equal, it is estimated, to upwards of 50 per cent. upon a total capital of £50,000. Whether or not this happy result is to be attained in the early future rests with you. We estimate, with additional capital of, say, £20,000, we can complete the circuit of twelve theatres, and for this purpose we hope you will supply us with the necessary sinews of war. My colleagues and I sincerely trust you are satisfied with the progress we have made, and will, in your own interests, provide the further capital which is so desirable if we are to act up to our title, and not only be the owners of the premier theatres in the cinematograph world, but also shareholders in the premier company from a financial point of view.

A number of questions were asked, to which the managing director replied, and a vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the meeting.

QUEER STORY.

THE CONVICT AND THE COCKROACH.

THE convict whistled softly. From some unseen cranny in the wall of the cell crept forth a cockroach, and made swiftly for the feast of crumbs which the convict had placed on the floor. A repulsive-looking insect it was, with its drab body, scarlet head, and beady eyes; none the less repulsive for the uncleanly odour that attended it. Most people would have shrunk from the creature with a shudder of disgust. Not so the convict. He bent over it and tickled its head caressingly with a straw, which he had taken from his mattress. The insect paused in its feeding, and seemed to look up as though accepting the caress. Presently it ran up the convict's leg and settled itself upon his knee; and still he tickled its head with the straw and whistled to it half under his breath. A certain tenderness shone in the hard, defiant eyes, transforming and refining the brutalised face. The coarse animal seemed to die from it; the human to reassert itself. Only a loathsome cockroach; a filthy insect—vermin marked out for destruction by all clean-minded beings. Yet a living sentient thing, the handiwork of our common Creator; and to this convict a friend, a confidant, a solace from loneliness and despair, a thing to live for, a softening influence, a minister of redemption!

Hark! What was that? The warder's step in the corridor. Gently, very gently and tenderly, the convict took the cockroach in his hand and set it on the floor, It understood, and ran swiftly back to its hiding place. The convict was distrustful of the warder. He thought the official mind likely to be intolerant of cockroaches. Yet, as a matter of fact, the warder knew all about it, having frequently seen the convict feed his strange pet through the spy-hole in the cell's door. He was a decent man, that warder. He had a heart under his blue tunic, and by reason of having a heart, he had tolerated the cockroach and connived at it. Possibly he didn't understand all that it meant to the convict. But he understood enough to make him shut his eyes.

The convict was not a favourite with the Governor of the prison. There was nothing strange in that. The convict was far from a prepossessing individual, and in the Governor's presence he always showed at his worst. A lawless hooligan, perpetually at war with authority, the sight of this domineering martinet, who represented to him, as it were, the personified embodiment of galling tyranny, stirred all the black rebellion within him. He dared not let it break out. The dread of the punishment-cell deterred him. So he took refuge in sullen, dogged, obstinate taciturnity.

"An ill-conditioned brute," thought the Governor. "Nothing but the cat is any good for such a fellow. One cannot appeal to the human element in an animal like him. There is nothing human to appeal to."

You see the Governor knew nothing, as yet, of the cockroach. Not that it would have altered his opinion, if he had. The Governor was not a man of sentiment. He prided himself, and with reason, on his hard practicality. If you had spoken to him of a cockroach as a minister of redemption, I am quite sure he would have laughed in your face.

It chanced one evening that the Governor took it into his head to make a round of inspection. He was passing along one of the corridors in his rubber-soled shoes when his ear was caught by the sound of a low, crooning whistle. Without difficulty he located the cell—our convict's cell—and looked in through the spy-hole. For a moment or two he watched. Then he silently beckoned the warder to unlock the door. In a twinkling it was done. The Governor marched into the cell.

"What's that? What are you doing?" he demanded sharply of the convict.

With a hasty movement the convict set the cockroach on the floor, and the creature ran for its hiding-place. The Governor saw it.

"Filthy vermin," he said. Then he stamped on it and crushed it. That was the end of the minister of redemption.

The convict went white as death. For the moment the shock of it held him stunned, stupefied. Then rage and hate, bitter murderous hate, leapt into his haggard eyes.

"You devil!" he cried.

The Governor's thin lips compressed themselves grimly.

"Warder! See that that man is brought before me to morrow morning," he said.

He turned and left the cell. The door slammed to with a sharp click. Only just in time. The convict, having now recovered his faculties, hurled himself against it and beat wildly with his fists on the solid wood, in his insane desire to get at the Governor—beat till his knuckles were raw and bleeding, yet felt nothing of the pain, and still he kept beating, and only desisted at length from sheer exhaustion.

Then he threw himself on his bed face downwards, and there was silence. Only the man's heaving shoulders and his mangled hands clutching spasmodically at the blankets bore witness to his agony. At length he sat up with bloodshot, maniac eyes, staring about him. He rose. He paced his cell. After a little he fell on his knees. It was an unwonted attitude. Not for twenty years and more, save as a matter of compulsion in the prison chapel, had the convict knelt in prayer. But now he knelt and prayed; and the man's whole soul, his sore, festering, ulcerated soul, was in the petition.

"God in Heaven—curse him! Plague him. Confound him. Do unto him even as I would do unto him, great God in Heaven!"

It was not the convict's ordinary language. A sort of inspiration was on him, the inspiration of rage, grief, and hatred, lifting him out of himself and imparting to his lips an unused, in a sense an exalted phraseology

Next morning the Governor of the prison, while still at his toilet, received a message that one of the warders wished to speak to him at once on an urgent matter. He hastily completed his dressing and went down to see the man.

The warder's agitation was apparent through the outer crust of his disciplined self-control.

"I have to report, sir, that No. 8,401 has committed suicide in his cell," he said.

"Eh? Committed suicide?" exclaimed the Governor, with a sudden frown.

"Yes, sir. Hanged himself by a strip of blanket from the bar of his window. We have just cut him down. The doctor has seen him, but it was too late."

"I'll come round at once," said the Governor, still frowning.

It was noteworthy that he appeared rather irritated than shocked by the intelligence. This was not the first suicide that had occurred in the prison under the Governor's régime, and such occurrences were apt to excite remark in certain quarters. There would have to be an inquest, of course, possibly also a private inquiry by the Home Office. Such things are unpleasant for a prison governor.

The convict's body lay on the bed, covered with a sheet. The warder drew it aside, disclosing the dead man's head and shoulders. It was not a pleasant sight—the blue livid mark round the neck, the tongue still hanging from the mouth, and—worse than all—the staring glassy eyes protruding far from their sockets.

The Governor was the reverse of a sensitive man. But he shuddered as he bade the warder replace the sheet. An extraordinary idea had flashed across his mind—fanciful, weird, even grotesque. Those protuberant eyes, standing out so horribly from the face, reminded him exactly of the eyes of a cockroach.

* * * * * *

Five years passed. The Governor, now retired, was living with his wife and family in an old-fashioned country cottage. It was a pleasant spot in which to pass one's declining days—quite a little sanctuary of rural peace, the very temple of perfect restfulness. But the restfulness of the surroundings found no echo in the Governor's bosom. For some while now he had been morose, irritable, ill-at-ease. He could not sleep at night. His appetite failed. His favourite pursuit of gardening lost its interest for him. At length his wife became seriously alarmed. The doctor was called in.

"Your husband is thoroughly out of sorts and run down," he told her. "His nerves are all wrong. Get him away from here awhile. Take him a sea voyage, if that is possible. If not, induce him to interest himself in local affairs, or at least to take up some occupation. Idleness is the worst possible thing for him in his present mood. He wants to employ himself, and to have plenty of cheerful society. In the meanwhile I'll send him round a tonic."

The Governor's wife did her best to comply with those instructions; but she found her husband intractable. Of leaving home he would not hear, and he positively declined to take any part in local affairs. So finding that pressure in this direction only made him irritable, she at length desisted, and matters were allowed to drift. Indeed, in the face of his refusal to carry out the doctor's orders, what else was to be done?

One morning, as she was writing letters in the drawing-room, she was startled by a sharp cry. At once she hurried to her husband's study, whence the sound proceeded.

He was sitting up on his chair, his face ashen-grey, his eyes shining with a nameless fear. They were riveted upon the carpet.

"See! See!" he gasped, through his chattering teeth.

She followed the direction of his gaze, and saw a cockroach. It stood there motionless before the Governor, seeming to look up at him impudently with its beady eyes.

"My dear," she said, soothingly. "It is only one of those horrid beetles!" And she moved forward to put her foot upon it.

He caught her arm and pulled her back roughly.

"Don't," he cried, hoarsely. "For God's sake, don't!"

She gazed at the distraught man in alarm. She noticed that the sweat was pouring from his face as though he had been undergoing violent exertion. Something of his terror communicated itself to her own heart. Only a cockroach; and to put him in this agony of fear! What did it mean? Was he going out of his mind?

She strove to reassure him.

Meanwhile the cockroach had disappeared. The Governor pulled himself together a little. "Only my nerves," he said. "It was stupid to give way. But I am always seeing these horrible creatures. The house is full of them. They haunt me! . . Don't leave me just yet," he added, clinging to her arm.

She felt the hand that clutched her shaking like an aspen.

Next morning, she spoke of the cockroaches to the cook. "There seem to be a great many about the house," she said. "We must take steps to get rid of them, cook. They rather get on the master's nerves. He has a horror of them."

"I'm sure I wish we could, m'm," answered the domestic. "I never see anything like them. They're all over the place. Can't think where they've all come from, neither. When we first came, there wasn't one to be seen. Now we're fairly over-run with the nasty things!"

"I'll ask the chemist to give us something," said her mistress.

The chemist advised boracic powder. A supply was laid in, and all the haunts of the cockroaches were plentifully sprinkled with it. It appeared to have the desired effect, and the Governor's wife began to flatter herself that she had driven the creatures away. But she was soon undeceived.

Coming one afternoon into her husband's study, she found him lying on the floor, apparently in a fit. She summoned one of the servants. Between them they got him on to a sofa. Brandy and other restoratives were applied, and the doctor was sent for.

He looked grave and spoke of syncope produced by some strong excitement—probably by a sudden shock. The patient's heart was still in a very weak state. He must be put to bed and kept perfectly quiet. With the doctor's help he was carried upstairs, still only half conscious.

By the doctor's advice his wife remained up with him that night. Somewhere towards dawn she fell into a doze. Presently she was awakened by a piercing scream. Her husband was sitting up in bed, his face transfigured with terror.

"Those eyes! Those eyes! Take them away! Save me!"

He stretched out his arms to her in a gesture of agonised appeal. She sprang forward. Too late! He had already fallen back upon the pillow—dead.

At that dreadful moment her gaze was suddenly attracted to a dark object on the coverlet. Her heart within her seemed to stand still with horror. She was staring into the beady eyes of an enormous cockroach.

BOOKS.

IN reading Miss James's "Joan of Arc" (1) I have had ringing in my ears one of the finest passages in Froude—his insistence upon the impossibility of the realisation by the modern mind of mediæval faith and practice:—"And now it is all gone—like an unsubstantial pageant faded; and between us and the old English there lies a gulf of mystery which the prose of the historian will never adequately bridge. They cannot come to us, and our imagination can but feebly penetrate to them. Only among the aisles of our cathedrals, only as we gaze upon their silent figures sleeping on their tombs, some faint conceptions float before us of what these men were when they were alive; and perhaps in the sound of church bells, that peculiar creation of mediæval age which falls upon the ear like the echo of a vanished world." It is indeed these church bells and all that they suggest which chiefly make the mediæval mind inconceivable to us. The only popular literature of that day—the only history, poetry, romance and drama—was sacred, miracle and mystery plays, legends of the saints and sermons of the Church. Hence miracles and marvels, angels and devils, witches and wizards were as real to the people as their everyday experiences and as their very existences. Joan of Arc, who to-day would be a spiritualist and clairvoyante, in these days was but one of a multitude who saw visions and heard voices and were regarded as heaven or hell inspired according to the prejudices of their critics. The inspiration itself was never doubted, only its source—divine or infernal—was in dispute. Joan's voices and visions being on the side of the French were hailed by them as divine; but being against the English and Burgundians were by them no less naturally considered diabolical. Nor were the monstrous unfairness and ferocity shown by the ecclesiastical tribunal in their trial, condemnation, and execution of her at the stake unnatural. There is no injustice like the injustice of an unjust judge, and no cruelty like the cruelty of a Christian Church. "Corruptio optimi pessima."

All this we can understand in reading the amazing story of the Maid of Orleans, and yet the days and scenes of the story are as dim and strange to us to-day as the monstrosities and incoherences of a dream are to a man who has awakened from it. Let me take but one monstrous incoherence. One of the most fervent and faithful of the Maid's followers was Gilles de Rais, who indeed was specially deputed to ride and to fight by her side. He was with her in almost all her victories, with her also in her defeats, "and it is even claimed that he was near her during her captivity at Rouen, endeavouring to carry out her rescue." When the curtain rises again upon Gilles de Rais you find this satanic miscreant beguiling hundreds of little children into his castle to put them there to death by the most refined, infernal, and prolonged torture. He put them indeed to many deaths, since he would revive them when at their last gasp, only in order, as that devilish Roman emperor said, that "he might feel them die" to the full. "He stained himself with blood from forehead to heel—he beheaded, he mutilated, he dismembered, he hacked furiously or cut delicately, as the humour took him. He killed like an artist, sucking his fill of sensuous pleasure with each calculated blow. He confessed that he preferred the sight of torture and of tears, of panic and of blood, to any other pleasure." When the curtain next rises on this incarnate devil he is being tried, convicted, and led to execution—an exemplary penitent! He preaches to his two accomplices of the love and forgiveness of God, assuring them of an immediate reunion with himself after death in Paradise! Then the sympathetic crowd, amongst it many parents of the children he had put to death by exquisite torture, prayed for his soul, and after his execution returned to their homes to flog all their other children soundly in order that "the whole thing should be impressed upon their minds"! In an age when such a monster as Gilles de Rais could be alternately saint and fiend, the most cynical of miscreants and the most exemplary of penitents, the Maid of Orleans might well be hailed as God-sent or devil-possessed according to the point of view—French or English. Success, the cynical standard by which she would be judged in a day when God is supposed to be on the side of the strongest battalions, was not the standard of the day when a crucifix in every room and on every road preached the failure, by this test, of the Founder of the Faith. The real failure of the Maid from the modern point of view was that of a clairvoyante who could not discern the hopeless weakness and worthlessness of the wretched king who embarrassed or countermined all her efforts on his behalf, and, when they failed at last through the failure of his support, forsook her.

Though Joan plays a minor part in Miss James's extremely interesting book—since we get only intermittent views of the Maid—the time which made her and her career possible is vividly brought before you. By the way, it is curious to find one of her most difficult converts, La Hire, making to God the same appeal that impressed me much when I first read it as an epitaph in George MacDonald's "David Elginbrod":—

"Here lie I, Martin Elginbrodde.
Have mercy o' my soul, Lord God,
As I wad do, were I Lord God,
And ye were Martin Elginbrodde."

It is also on a tombstone in the cloister church at Dobberan, in Mecklenburg, where perhaps George Macdonald saw and copied it.

The Duchesse de Dino's "Memoirs" (2)—Third Series—do not throw much light upon English society as it was in the forties; but the little they do throw is extremely interesting. Lady Holland, who next to Queen Elizabeth seems to me the most detestable of famous Englishwomen, does not, as you might expect, shine as a mother-in-law. Her daughter-in-law writes "Lady Holland surpasses everything that could be imagined in the way of rapacity and selfishness—in a novel her character would be thought exaggerated and impossible;" and she proceeds to give evidence of this high-handed virago's grasping greediness which amply justifies the outburst. An English correspondent of the Duchesse's suggests a domestic reason for the interest in politics shown by the Prince Consort, which was so resented by the nation. Now, says this correspondent, that Queen Victoria knows nothing can shake Sir Robert Peel in his seat her interest in politics is gone—unfortunately for the Prince Consort, "to whom she devotes her whole attention. She holds him in, does not give him a moment's freedom, and actually tyrannises over him till the poor Prince finds it difficult to conceal his disgust and weariness of this treatment." The Duchesse still continues under her extraordinary illusion about the ingenuousness of her uncle, Talleyrand. "M. de Talleyrand was so natural in every respect, and laid such stress upon truth in matters of life, that I have constantly heard him exclaim, as if replying to his own thoughts, 'What a fine thing simplicity is!'" To me this recalls the story of the Jew, who, having by some mischance wandered into a Christian church and heard there a sermon on charity, was moved so profoundly that he hurried at the close of the service to the church-door—to hold out his hat! Charity was the most excellent of things—to the receiver! To the wily diplomatist what a fine thing simplicity is—in others!

Sir Alexander Arbuthnot's "Memories of Rugby and India" (3) will interest old Indians more than old Rugbeians or than the general public. His Indian reminiscences, though they stretch far back and include the Mutiny, are not of much public interest, while his recollections of Rugby are few and dim. At Rugby he had as his head-master Dr. Arnold and as his schoolfellows the doctor's three sons, Matthew, Tom, and Willie, Tom Hughes also, the author of "Tom Brown's School Days," and his brother George. He formed a poor opinion of Matthew Arnold's abilities as compared with Matthew's brother Tom's, and of Tom Hughes's abilities as compared with Tom's brother George's; but his estimate of the great Head himself confirms that which Matthew Arnold gives you in "Rugby Chapel," and which Tom Hughes gives you in "Tom Brown's School Days." "After fifty years' acquaintance with all sorts and conditions of men I still retain unaltered the impression made upon me as a boy of seventeen, that Dr. Arnold was the most high-minded man I had ever met."

Mr. Arnold Bennett's "Clayhanger" (4) is a perfectly amazing tour de force. It recalls to me a lecture by a working-man to working-men in a Finchley brickfield on a November day under a London fog. The lecturer took up in succession a piece of chalk, a piece of flint, a clod, and a soapy mass of London clay, and made each in turn tell its story to his spell-bound audience. Mr. Arnold Bennett similar interests you so deeply in similarly dreary products that you look forward with eagerness to the two promised sequels. It is significant that no less than three poets should write, "Whoever loved that loved not at first sight"—Chapman, Marlowe, and Shakespeare, quoting from Marlowe; and again that two of Shakespeare's most ardent heroines, Rosalind and Juliet, should have illustrated the sentiment. It is illustrated hardly less romantically or less fervently in Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick's delightful novel, "The Lantern Bearers" (5). Not only Mrs. Sidgwick's lovers are delightful, but also the heroine's German mother, while their German paying guest, a kind of impersonation of Baedeker, is a perfectly original and inimitable creation. Mr. Lacon Watson's "Barker's" (6), besides being an interesting and unusually well-written novel, gives you tantalising and suggestive glimpses into the green-room of the publishing business.

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

Much vivid light is thrown on the history of the Navy and the deeds and the personalities of its greatest heroes, from the Armada to Trafalgar, by a remarkably interesting volume of "Letters from the English Seamen" (Chapman and Hall, 10s. 6d. net), edited by E. Hallam Moorhouse. The correspondence is grouped into four periods, each having a connecting and explanatory prelude by the editor. Hawkins, Drake, Hawke, Rodney, Collingwood, Nelson—these are a few of the famous names appended to the letters, and among them is one written by Nelson a fortnight before Trafalgar which has hitherto been unpublished, and which is now reproduced in fac-simile.

Mr. Outram Tristram's book, "Moated Houses," with illustrations by the late Herbert Railton, will be issued by Messrs. Methuen this week. It was said by Balzac that the characters of a people can be deduced from the architecture of their houses, and Mr. Tristram's aim has been to make the owners of these moated houses appear again in the habit in which they lived.

Towards the end of this month Messrs. Duckworth will have ready a guinea volume on "The Golf Courses of the British Isles," described by Mr. Bernard Darwin and illustrated by Mr. Harry Rowntree. Some sixty of the principal courses are dealt with by Mr. Darwin, who is well known both as a player of golf and a writer on the game. Mr. Rowntree has supplied sixty-four pictures, of which forty-eight will be reproduced in colour.

Mr. John Barnett has given the title of "Fighting Admirals" to a volume from his pen which Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. will publish next week. It consists of stirring essays on thirteen fighting sailor-men, and is illustrated with authentic portraits. Another of Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co.'s publications next week will be a fairy story by Mr. Eden Phillpotts. Called "The Flint Heart," the story turns upon the changes produced in human hearts by a strange paleolithic talisman and the visits of the children to the fairies in search of a remedy. The book will have sixteen full-page illustrations by Mr. Charles J. Folkard.

For the last ten years or more Mr. H. Hesketh Pritchard, the well-known novelist, has been an adventurous hunter in the wild parts of North and South America, and some of his experiences are recorded in a new book which Mr. Heinemann publishes this week. The title is "Hunting Camps in Wood and Wilderness," and the volume is illustrated in colour by Mr. E. G. Caldwell, besides having many drawings by Lady Helen Graham.

Mr. Walter Larden, in his "Recollections of an Old Mountaineer," which Mr. Edward Arnold has ready this week, gives an interesting survey of Swiss climbing during the last thirty years.

The late Martin Hume's last book, "True Stories of the Past," with a preface by Mr. R. B. Cunninghame Graham, will be issued immediately by Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

"The Rubiayat of Hafiz," the latest addition to Mr. Murray's "Wisdom of the East" series, has never before appeared in separate book form. Dr. Abdul Majid's translation has been rendered into verse by Mr. L. Cramer-Byng, and the volume has a full introduction dealing with the life of Hafiz and his philosophy.

"Old Kensington Palace and Other Papers" (Chatto and Windus, 6s.) is a collection of essays by Mr. Austin

Dobson in a volume uniform with his "Eighteenth Century Vignettes." These also are mostly eighteenth-century themes, upon which Mr. Dobson has written with characteristic grace and charm.

Mr. Unwin has issued a popular edition, price 2s. 6d., of M. Charles Seignobos' "History of Contemporary Civilisation."

Mr. Philip Sergeant, whose life of the great Empress Dowager of China is being published by Messrs. Hutchinson, spent more than four years in China while that remarkable woman's sway was at its height.

"Seymour Hicks: Twenty-four Years of an Actor's Life," is the title of what will doubtless prove a popular theatrical autobiography. The book is announced for publication by Mr. Alston Rivers next week at the price of half-a-crown.

ART.

NATIONALITY IN ART.

THE death of Willem Maris is an event of greater artistic significance to English art than might at first sight appear. A distinguished landscape painter himself, and one—the youngest—of a trio of distinguished artist-brothers, his career is symptomatic of that Renaissance of nationalism in art which offers perhaps the only salvation in England, as elsewhere, from the universal mediocrity with which art is threatened. As is frequently the case, William Maris's gifts were first recognised abroad rather than at home, and especially by those international dealers who nowadays set the fashions in painting. But of late years the Dutch have themselves shown an increasing desire to possess his works, and rightly, because his work is most truly national.

More than either of his brothers—of whom Matthew is most appreciated in this country, and living in it—does Willem Maris give evidence of a truly Dutch feeling. The pupil of his brothers, themselves pupils of Hébert, he reveals not the grey, dreary Holland inherited from Barbizon or from the passenger through Holland in the early hours of the morning after a bad crossing. On the contrary, his Holland has blue skies and lush meadows; his sunshine, always radiant, has also the pleasing coolness of a summer day by the river; his animals, whether cows or ducklings, give a sense of supreme contentment with life, and that the laughing, joyous life of the real Dutchman. Nothing was trivial or common to him, and his "portraits" of yellow ducklings taking to the water call up whole visions of Dutch pastoral life.

The work of Willem Maris, however, is proof that to be a national painter it is not necessary to have generations behind you either of painting or of nationality. Willem's grandfather was a Bohemian named Maresch who settled in Holland; his father was a printer. Nor does there seem any particular hereditary reason for this unusual trio of brothers, beyond the fact that their father seems to have shown an inclination for art in his encouragement of his sons. Possibly, it may be, his semi-foreign ancestry supplied to Willem Maris the detached standpoint necessary for the appreciation of an attached subject. Whatever the cause his was one of the names which should be writ large in the Dutch annals of painting.

The element of foreignness in art is nowhere better evidenced than in Sir Hubert von Herkomer, whose book "The Herkomers" (Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net) has just appeared. It is indeed surprising that he should have done such distinguished work, considering that he is to all intents and purposes a German, upon whom England has been forced by circumstances. How intensely German he is can only be gathered from his book, which is one of the most sincere and most absorbing life-stories it has been my lot to read for some time. Although taken to America as a baby, and brought up in England, Sir Hubert is, as he himself declares after his first visit to the Fatherland, a Bavarian at heart. Had he remained in Germany he might still have become a painter, might probably even have done something to stem the torrent of extraneous matter which has brought German art to its present plight. There is a sincerity, a wholesome steady feeling about his work which recalls even in its English guise the old German masters. Sir Hubert is perhaps as much a "might-have-been" as a being, and his book explains this more fully. Not his least German trait is his extraordinary filial affection, of which every page is redolent. "The Herkomers" is indeed even more a life of his father than of himself. His father seems to belong to the type of German who honourably and diligently adorns manual labour with all the beauty of idealism. He must have been something of a genius. A master-joiner, he possessed unusual artistic capacity combined with a practical inventiveness which has enabled him to follow and assist his son all through his career. The portrait of his father by Sir Hubert recalls in its dignity and profundity a sort of Hans Sachs of old Germany. Sir Hubert relates how his proficiency on the zither once led him, in times of stress, to attempt Christy-minstrelism, which attempt was, however, fruitless. Add to the art by which he is best known his musical capacity and the literary power which is capable of a work such as "The Herkomers," and you have in Sir Hubert von Herkomer all-roundness reminiscent of the best period of the Renaissance.

* * * * * *

Perhaps the only legitimate form of living upon the brains of others is to allow them to speak for themselves. Thus the hundred best books, or the "Hundred Masterpieces of Painting" (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net), are a pleasant change from adjectival disquisitions upon books that we have not read and pictures that we have not seen. Mr. R. G. Witt has not been hardy enough to give to his choice the title of the Hundred Best Pictures, which accounts, perhaps, for the personal note struck by his selection. Thus he very rightly devotes a certain space to the much-neglected German school; and shows great discretion and taste in his selection of such painters as Whistler, Charles Furse, and Matthew Maris. The majority of the illustrations, each accompanied by a short, lucid disquisition, are excellently reproduced, the older schools, by reason of their greater definition, coming out best. The book is useful as an index and delightful as a picture-book.

* * * * * *

Mr. Albert Rothenstein suffers from a fatal facility. His exhibition at Carfax Gallery betrays considerable cleverness in about six different directions. At one moment he suggests Mr. John, at another Conder; a third picture recalls Manet, a fourth Van Eyck, a fifth Mr. Sargent. Now and again, in "Gwendolen" or in "A Non-Political Meeting," is what I conclude to be the real Mr. Rothenstein. In his landscapes Mr. Rothenstein fails to achieve a sense of distance; in his character-studies he is a trifle too fond of the cleverness of contortions. In these latter, however, his strength comes out, and they contain some of the coherence lacking in his other work.

MUSIC.

THE London County Council has now formally accepted Mr. Hammerstein's offer for one of the Kingsway sites at a rent of £4,875, and next year will see London in possession of a second opera house, which may have as long an existence in that capacity as Covent Garden, or may share the fate of the building which is now the Palace Theatre of Varieties. It cannot truthfully be said that the omens are too favourable. Instance the present season at Covent Garden. Mr. Beecham is giving splendid performances, but the audiences have been for the most part miserably poor. Injudicious choice of works may, perhaps, have had something to do with this, and a vast improvement has certainly been noticeable when works such as "Tristan" and "Tannhäuser" have been given. But, speaking generally, the attendance has been nothing like what it should have been. Mr. Hammerstein, with his hustling American methods, may achieve better results. But he will accomplish something like a miracle if he does.

Meanwhile, nothing daunted, Mr. Beecham is arranging to give another season of opéra comique at His Majesty's next summer, and everyone will admire his pluck in doing so, and wish him once again every success. Such indomitable perseverance as his must, one can only hope, meet its reward in the end. There are, of course, those who hold that grand opera is a form of art constitutionally alien to the British temperament, and that it is ploughing the sands to try ever to develop a national taste for it in this country. This, however, is, to say the least, a very large assumption. There was a time when opera was just as much of an exotic in Germany as it is among ourselves to-day. English people are fond enough of the theatre and likewise of music. Why, therefore, should they dislike the two combined? Nay, they are actually inordinately fond of the two combined already in the form of musical comedy. There seems no reason, therefore, to despair of the future.

Miss Marie Brema announces another season at the Savoy next month, when she proposes to bring forward her beautiful revival of "Orpheus" again, along with other works considerably less familiar. Two works by Emanuel Moor, "Pompadour" and "Wedding Bells" by name, are promised among others. Miss Brema has the advantage of possessing a good following of her own, and if she does as well with some of her newer works as she did with "Orpheus" she should have no reason to complain. Apropos of the latter, I heard an amusing story the other day of one humble amateur who went and was delighted. Describing his impressions subsequently, he remarked, "I forget the name of the composer—Verdi, I fancy." But it really does not matter whether opera-goers know the names of the composers so long as they like the music.

Leroux's "Le Chemineau," which was produced by Mr. Beecham last week, is not a great work, but it is certainly interesting. "French and fine" is a Browning phrase which sums up concisely the merits of Leroux's music. It does not scale the heights or sound the depths, but it produces, none the less, a very pleasant impression by reason of its delicacy and grace. The composer writes with great skill, but prefers to charm rather than astonish. Fifty years ago he would probably have laid himself out to produce an imposing work on massive lines, with brilliant ensembles and the rest. Young France to-day has other ideals. It recognises more fully the virtues of reticence and restraint, and achieves its ends by subtler methods. Leroux's music, therefore, is of the quietist order—more concerned with the psychology of the action than externals, though now and again, when the situation demands it, he can employ more vigorous methods to good purpose. But in general he is content to do his spiriting gently, and if the result occasionally tends to monotony the work as a whole makes very pleasant hearing. The performance was first-rate, M. Roselli doing particularly well in the title-part, while of the others, Miss Elizabeth Amsden, Mr. Harry Dearth, and Mr. Maurice D'Oisly were all conspicuously good.

All opera lovers will have heard with sincere regret of the death of Mr. Gilibert, as the result of an operation. Few artists have enjoyed greater popularity at Covent Garden, where, till last season, he had appeared regularly for I know not how many years in parts of every sort and kind. His versatility was, indeed, remarkable. Whether as peasant or patrician, bandit or monk, the gayest of Bohemians in "La Bohême," or the heaviest of heavy fathers in "Roméo et Juliette," Gilibert was always a delight and a joy. And the man was as popular as the artist. In the one capacity as in the other he will be sincerely mourned.

Concerts are still not very numerous, but one or two of interest were given last week. Thus, at the first of those arranged by the Classical Concert Society, that fine 'cellist, M. Pablo Casals, was heard again; while on the same afternoon M. de Pachmann was as entertaining as ever at the Queen's Hall. A recital given by Signor Sammarco had many features of interest, but this fine operatic artist is, perhaps, just a little disappointing in the concert-room. Fine as his singing is in the technical sense, it seems to lack the variety and subtlety of interpretation properly to be looked for nowadays in concert singing of the highest order. An unfamiliar symphony, "In der Natur," by Emil Paur, which was introduced at one of the Promenades, proved a very genial and engaging example of highly skilled, up-to-date music-making, of little real importance, perhaps, but none the less a work full of cleverness and bustling effectiveness. Hearing a work of this sort, it is indeed depressing to reflect on the months and months of patient labour and of fine musicianship which it represents, yet all to such relatively little purpose in the end. It is played once or twice, the proud author is applauded and complimented, and the rest is—oblivion!

Overheard after last week's Pachmann recital:—

"How did you enjoy it?"

"Not very much. I couldn't hear half he said."

Apropos of the question of characteristics of keys about which I recently had something to say, I read with interest an article on the same subject, by Mr. J. Swinburne, in a recent number of the Musical Standard, going into the matter at greater length and furnishing still further reasons for thinking that the whole idea of such characteristics existing is quite imaginary. The error may have had its origin, he suggests, in the differences between the old modes, subsequently perpetuated, after the modes themselves had been abandoned, by the differently tuned keys on the mean-tone system. Mr. Swinburne calls attention further to a practical aspect of the matter which is worth noting. This is the fact that if composers would recognise the truth there would be no need to write music in out of the way keys at all, and the art would be to that extent simplified.

> If we never used more than two sharps or two flats at the signature of a piece, we would never be more than a semitone away from any pitch desired by the most fastidious in that direction. The need for modulation would bring in a sharp or a flat or two more. The result of this would be that music, as far as playing and reading are concerned, would be considerably simplified, and the more you remove unnecessary difficulties, the more time is free to devote to the overcoming of unavoidable obstacles, and, therefore, the more the art is advanced.

This is a very sound point.

THE THEATRES.

"Grace," at the Duke of York's.

"GRACE," Mr. Somerset Maugham's new play, suggests to me that its author has dipped his pen into Sir Arthur Pinero's inkpot, for during the whole of the first act I was constantly reminded of "His House in Order." Here was Miss Irene Vanbrugh once more beating her ineffectual wings against the walls of a hide-bound little society, but whereas poor Nina Jesson had never kicked over the traces in revolt, Grace Insole, the wife of Claude Insole, landed proprietor, has had, and is in the midst of, an affair with an unspeakable cad called Henry Cobbet. She is a nobody who has married into a family of county people, who pride themselves on their birth and breeding and brag of the misdemeanours of their illustrious ancestors. Grace has been married ten years, and she hates her husband just as strongly as he worships her, and then a wonder comes to pass, and she loves him with all her heart and soul—all in a minute! This is how it comes to pass. Mr. Edmund Gwenn, gamekeeper on the Insole estate, has a daughter who has been frail, and it is an inflexible law with the Insoles that all frail maidens must be sent into exile, otherwise they would contaminate the place and pollute the air which Mrs. Insole breathes. Accordingly, Mr. Gwenn is told that his daughter must leave. When he refuses to send her away, pleading that she needs a father's care, he is given the alternative of packing her off or being dismissed himself, and this after forty years' service—man and boy. To save the situation the girl commits suicide, and Mr. Gwenn, mad with grief, nearly shoots his master. There is a finely played dramatic scene when the old man comes to his employer with the gun from which he has extracted the cartridges because he fears to carry it loaded, and Insole, who will fear no man on his place, loads it for him and sends him away. It is this piece of grit which, I imagine, makes Grace realise that her husband, though narrow in his views, is a man, and forthwith she loves him. I could not help thinking, however, that she might have gauged his character somewhat earlier in the ten years of her married life.

The problem, of course, throughout all this tragedy is Mrs. Insole's problem. She knows that the girl is no worse than she is herself, and yet the one has been hounded to death in order to leave the air pure for the other. She is rent with agony in trying to make up her mind whether or no to confess to her husband and shatter his beautiful faith in her. In despair, at last, she confesses to his brother, who is a parson, and asks his advice. He says, confess. But there appears on the scene Miss Vernon of Foley, the lady whom Claude Insole ought to have married, and who has remained single for his sake. Miss Vernon has guessed Grace's guilty secret, but she is not vindictive, and all she cares about is the happiness of the man she loves. So, in a very interesting scene of sophistry, she combats the parson's arguments. "Confession! Bosh!" she says. "Your punishment is to hold your tongue. You have a load on your mind. Keep it there. If you love Claude, spare him the truth;" and uncommonly well did Miss Lillah McCarthy play her part in this triangular scene with the wife and the priest. Eventually she carries her point, and the curtain falls on husband and wife in each other's arms—the wife with sealed lips and the husband in a fool's paradise.

Mr. Dennis Eadie plays the landowner with great skill, though to me he never looks the part; and Mr. Leslie Faber is quite good as the parson brother, who has gone into the Church because of the family living, and puts comforts above convictions; while Mr. Arthur Wontner is suitably unpleasant as the cad lover who dallies with his friend's wife because he thinks it is just as much in the day's work as shooting or golfing. Lady Tree speaks all the lines of the tyrannical old Lady Insole with great effect. She stands for the old order, and is firm on it not changing. I suppose there still is such a county society as she represents, but I am thankful to say I have not come across it. Mr. Gwenn, as I have said above, is wholly admirable in his one great scene; and Miss Irene Vanbrugh gives a very poignant picture of the unhappy wife whose tragedy is that the sin she so bitterly repents has really been, as Miss Vernon of Foley points out, the means of awaking her love for her husband. I could wish, however, that she would not force the note so much in the scene where she discovers the worthlessness of her lover. To get a big effect she drops into ranting. As in all Mr. Maugham's work, there is much caustic writing and there are many clever lines, but I still think that our most successful dramatist is a writer of comedy, not of drama. There is too much head and not enough heart about his work for great emotion, and, clever though "Grace" may be, you come away with a disagreeable feeling.

"Company for George," at the Kingsway.

There was a man once who took unto himself a temporary partner, and the affair lasted more or less unhappily for some twenty years. When a callous friend eventually remarked, rather brutally, "My dear fellow, if you're unhappy why have not you ended the affair long since?" the unfortunate sufferer said, drearily, "Don't you know that it is very much easier to get any one into your house than to get them out?" I was reminded of this story by Mr. Warren Bell's amusing little farcical comedy, "Company for George." Miss Eva Moore, who is a charming young married woman, invites Mr. Kenneth Douglas to stay for a few days because she thinks he will be such excellent company for her husband, George (Mr. Fewlass Llewellyn). He comes, but he will not go. He is a genial, egotistical, and audacious undergraduate, and, finding his quarters very pleasant, no hints from the worried husband, who speedily gets sick of "the bounder," will shift him. Of course he is encouraged to stay by Miss Moore, who is the soul of hospitality, but his presence soon becomes an unmitigated nuisance, especially as he acts on the principle that what is yours is mine with his host's money, cigars, and whisky, and occupies quarters which are urgently required for rich relatives. Telegrams which arrive from these relatives announcing their advent are impudently answered by the unwelcome guest, who puts them off with audacious lies, and even the house being burnt down is hardly sufficient to dislodge him. He is not a tertium quid. He is not attracted by Miss Moore, but there is a pretty hospital nurse who has caught his undergraduate fancy, and in the end a stroke of fortune enables him to marry her. So all ends well, though he announces that he will settle near and still give George his company. As William Claypole, of Cambridge, Mr. Douglas has an excellent part, which he plays with delightful assurance, and Miss Eva Moore is very pleasing as the wife. Whether the play will prove strong enough to suit an exacting public is another matter. It is quite amusing, and the situations are ingenious; but it is very slight and flimsy, and harps too much on one theme with a quite unnecessary amount of reiteration. It was received, however, very cordially, and is quite a pleasant little entertainment.

"Lysistrata," at the "Little Theatre."

London's newest playhouse has arisen on the site of the back premises of Coutts's old bank buildings. It is a charming little drawing-room theatre, daintily decorated à la Wedgwood in blue and white, and here it is that Miss Gertrude Kingston is going to give us the newest thing in dramatic fare. Not always the newest thing, by the way, for she has started with an adaptation of Aristophanes' "Lysistrata." The only reason I can see why Miss Kingston should have selected this play is that she wished to open her theatre by striking a blow for the Suffragist cause, but I think she was ill-advised. The women in Aristophanes' comedy were not vote seekers anxious to do without men. Very much au contraire indeed. They were sick at heart because all lovers and husbands were always away at a never-ending war, and so decided, at the instigation of the strong-minded Lysistrata, that when these men rushed home during a short truce they should be denied home comforts, or, as it says in this genteel version, the women swore an oath in heaven that they would "abstain from love" until peace was made. Well, the men did not like this, and so the war came to an end. M. Maurice Donnay some time since wrote an exceedingly amusing and impudent version of the play, but this would not do for England. Miss Kingston's version, however, is well adapted for a drawing-room theatre. It is Aristophanes made into a Suffragist tract in rhymed couplets and delivered by a bevy of attractive young women. I confess it bored me, though the stage pictures are charming. As the leader of the revolt, not against men but against war, Miss Kingston spoke her long speeches with great fervour and dramatic effect, and she looked exceedingly distinguished, but I could not help feeling that the steps of the Acropolis which formed the stage setting were really the plinth of the Nelson column, and pretty and dainty though the whole thing was, it did not seem to me to be Aristophanes or anything. You cannot make an impossible theme possible by expurgating the impossibilities. It becomes merely nothing. As Mr. Laurence Housman has now owned to being the adaptor I mention his name, but I would rather see some of his original work, as, for instance, his censored play "Pains and Penalties."

"The Faun," at the Empire.

A very exquisite little fantasy is Miss Dora Bright's "The Faun," now being played at the Empire. It tells a simple story of a Tuscan flower girl who brings a statue to life by sprinkling it with water from the fountain of which it is the centrepiece. Once every fifty years, so the legend runs, this miracle can be performed. The faun, Mr. Fred Farren, comes down from his pedestal and dances with all his old cunning and lightness, while nothing could well be more fascinating than Mlle. Lydia Kyasht's dancing as the girl. She acts the part, too, uncommonly well, showing at once fear and fascination, for, I suppose, it is a little awesome to find yourself being compelled to dance with a statue you had thought was marble even though you had thoughtlessly invoked it to come to life. The trifle ends with the faun returning to his perch, while the girl faints just as people come out of a neighbouring church after Mass. The music is charming, and I admired Mr. Farren immensely, both as the rigidly immobile statue and in the interim as one of the lightest and best dancers that we possess.

RACING NOTES.

THE Cesarewitch has not excited much general interest this year, apart from the uncertainty respecting Bronzino. The owner and trainer of this horse have been the subjects of some criticisms which were utterly unwarrantable and in the greatest degree offensive. Bronzino met with a slight accident, of which information was at once given to the Press, and it was then announced that it was hoped to get him to the post at Newmarket in fit condition. It has been plainly hinted that the accident was a fiction, and Bronzino has been described as "a Jekyll and Hyde horse," "a most mysterious favourite," and so on and so forth. I very much wonder that owners and trainers ever trouble themselves to hasten to the Press with information of such mishaps, considering how very ungraciously their efforts on behalf of the betting public are usually received. Bronzino was absurdly handicapped after his prominent running in the Grand Prix, but, as I have several times pointed out, the St. Leger form has usually been upset both in the Cesarewitch and in the Cambridgeshire, and faithful followers of the same have found themselves led to perdition over and over again. Bronzino was heavily backed at the finish, and he ran well. I rather fancy that Mr. J. de Rothschild's horse might have been third if he had been ridden out to the end. The placings in the race need not be regarded, as Verney had won at the Bushes. Mr. Neumann's horse was much fancied at Newmarket, but there appeared to be a strong impression that Magic would beat him. I never could see that Mr. Beddington's horse could have a chance with his weight on the Goodwood Cup running, and he ran untried, after having undergone a very hugger-mugger sort of training. Verney had gone through an excellent preparation, and he came to the post in prime condition. Verney was known to be a good stayer, and he has shown respectable form, so he was very nicely weighted with 7 st. 11 lb., and it was no disgrace for the heavily weighted three-year-old to be beaten by him. Pure Gem, who carried a great deal of money, was the disappointment of the race, for he was never dangerous, and there must have been some egregious muddling about his trial, or he may have refused to exert himself. Two horses ran notably well, both of them being rank outsiders, and it is quite on the cards that they will carry off two of the back-end handicaps. Declare was most fancied of the Manton lot, but Admiral Togo III. proved to be the best of the three, as he finished second in spite of his 10 lbs. penalty. I do not a bit believe, however, that this horse was really second best. A number of people backed Lagos, who had given much satisfaction in his gallops, and he is one of the few genuine stayers now in training. Lagos, however, never showed prominently, and it is thought that he cannot now be trusted to give his best running in public. He is probably tired of racing.

Dibs was a much-fancied failure, as a number of people were gulled into backing this horse on the strength of some fiddle-faddle cackle about his having given Lemberg a great deal of trouble in the race for the Jockey Club Stakes. The romance about the Derby winner and Dibs was all moonshine, as Lemberg won the Jockey Club Stakes in a common canter, and the horse whose chance appeared to be improved by that running was really Bronzino. Lemberg could certainly give 7 lbs. to Dibs, and in the St. Leger Bronzino beat Lemberg at even weights, while in the Cesarewitch Dibs was giving 7 lbs. to Mr. J. de Rothschild's horse. Columbus was well backed, and he was much fancied for a place, but this horse requires a strong jockey, and no boy could do full justice to him over this course. On recent running it would appear that Last Call would have won the Cesarewitch if he had started. Mr. Robinson's horse certainly ought to have won the Newbury Autumn Cup with 7 st. 1 lb., but, owing to a mishap, he lost by a head to Admiral Togo III., who carried 7 st. 6 lbs. Last week the three-year-old would have been receiving 15 lbs., so it is clear that he must have finished first or second. It does not speak well for the discrimination of the handicappers that Verney carried a penalty of 5 lbs. and won with quite 10 lbs. in hand, while Admiral Togo III. struggled into second place in spite of a 10 lbs. penalty! There would have been a much larger field, but for the hard state of the ground during the last month. This caused the withdrawal of several horses, including The Nut, who was confidently expected to run well. It may be hoped that next year the Stewards of the Jockey Club will postpone the publication of the weights for the Cesarewitch until after Doncaster race week. There is now no genuine and extended betting on this handicap until after the race for the Duke of York Stakes at Kempton Park. I see it is stated that Bronzino did not go well in the betting after his mishap, but the early market on this race was a mere paltry puddle, and when speculation did begin in earnest on Wednesday, Mr. J. de Rothschild's horse travelled so briskly that he was soon a firm favourite at 100 to 30, and 3 to 1 was taken to a lot of money. It was a case of 6 to 1 bar one.

I had expected that Nerestan would win the Clearwell Stakes, but the French colt was withdrawn from his engagements for last week. Nerestan is not entered for any race at the Houghton Meeting, and if he is seen out again this season it will presumably be in a nursery. He is a very smart colt, but he has destroyed his chance in most of his races by losing a lot of ground at the start. The Clearwell resulted in a very exciting finish between Borrow and Invicta, Night Rider being nowhere, and I expect this colt has been raced quite enough during the past season. Lord Falmouth's filly was unlucky not to win the Clearwell. The best two-year-old performance on Tuesday was the victory of Mushroom in the Suffolk Nursery, for he was giving 16 lbs. to Porphyrio, who has shown respectable form, and who was here backed down to 2 to 1 in a field of fourteen, but he is not a boy's horse. Many of the clever people went for Ilia, who was said to be a Netheravon "pot," but she ran very badly indeed. Mushroom showed good form earlier in the season, and he is a smart colt. He was much fancied by many Newmarket people, as he had been going uncommonly well in his gallops. It is most unfortunate for Mr. Baring that Mushroom should have been struck out of several good engagements for next season, including the Chester Vase and the Atlantic Stakes at Liverpool (10 lbs. breeding allowance in each race), the Royal Stakes at Newbury (12 lbs. allowed), and the Breeders' Foal Plate at Wolverhampton (15 lbs. allowed). On paper

Mushroom is about the best of the two-year-olds, taking a line with Borrow through Porphyrio.

Some of Dean Swift's admirers were so infatuated as to expect that he would make Lemberg gallop in earnest in the Champion Stakes, which was a wildly chimerical idea, considering that the pair were meeting at weight for age. Dean Swift never had a chance with the Derby winner. There was a fine entry for this race, but it dwindled down to a match. Odds were betted on Winkipop for the Oaks, although she was giving Yellow Slave 9 lbs., and the distance was beyond her best course. There was a fine finish, and Mr. Astor's filly was cleverly beaten by Yellow Slave, whom she had twice defeated, but the winner ought to have been made favourite over this distance, remembering how cleverly she had beaten Rosedrop at Doncaster. Winkipop is not likely to be seen out again this year, and next season she has no promising engagement. This mare must be in great need of a rest, as she has started for thirteen races during the season, so she has been in constant work ever since the early spring.

Lord Falmouth has sustained a serious loss by the death of Lady's Mantle, winner of the Champion Breeders' Foal Stakes at Derby. She dropped dead at Newmarket last Tuesday after finishing third for the Alington Plate. Lady's Mantle was an improving filly, and she appeared likely to develop into a useful three-year-old. She was finely bred, being by Ladas out of Field Sable, and she would have been a valuable acquisition to the Mereworth stud when she retired from the Turf. Lady's Mantle was entered for next year's Oaks, but she paid forfeit on March 29, and she had been struck out of most of her other engagements as a three-year-old.

The filly by Isinglass out of Sceptre was made favourite for the Cheveley Park Stakes, but the race was won very cleverly by Knockfeerna, Joie de Vivre and Spalato being both unplaced. Sir William Bass's filly might have won at five furlongs, but she collapsed in the Dip. Knockfeerna was a great tip at Newmarket, as she is said to be now the best two-year-old in the Clarehaven stable. The performance was a good one, as she was giving 10 lbs. to the favourite. The field for this race was disappointing, as it had been hoped that Hair Trigger II. and Alice would have started.

Phryxus was not sent from Manton to run for the Prendergast Stakes, and Wrinkler was made a great favourite, but he was just beaten by Stedfast, who had 9 lbs. the best of the weights. Lord Derby's colt is still very backward. Wrinkler is much touched in his wind. Alice found no difficulty in beating Persephone for the Bretby Stakes, and the bookmakers were very generous in accepting only 2 to 1 about Lord Falmouth's filly, for if ever there was a real good thing this was one. Alice is a very smart filly indeed, and capable of great improvement. She is engaged in the One Thousand, in the Oaks, and in the Coronation Stakes at Ascot, and in the St. Leger.

The astounding result of the Middle Park Plate entirely justifies the opinion, repeatedly expressed in Truth, that the two-year-olds are all heads and tails together, and therefore a very moderate lot. There were but five starters, although it cost only £10 to run, and there were ninety-seven entries. It is a great pity that Prince Palatine, Knockfeerna, Nerestan, and Sunstar were not started. Seaforth was distinctly lucky in the race, and I certainly think that he ought to have won, but it would in any case have been a near thing. The success of Borrow, however, could not possibly have been anticipated. In the Clearwell Stakes Borrow could only beat Invicta by a head, and at the First October Meeting Lord Falmouth's filly had finished a head in front of Meleager, with 13 lbs. the best of the weights. In the Hopeful Stakes Borrow ran a dead-heat with Sunstar. The two-year-old form is a hopeless tangle, and the official handicap, which is to be published to-morrow, is awaited with much interest. The Middle Park Plate upset was a veritable crash for plungers, as the race was generally regarded as a match between Seaforth and Pietri, and backers practically confined themselves to the pair, the gambling between them being very heavy; 20 to 1 could be had bar three, and it certainly looked all the odds on public form. "You really cannot handicap cocktails," was the remark of Admiral Rous, after a similarly amazing upset of public form. King William will probably be the best of the lot next year, and Lord Derby appears likely to have a good season in 1911. In Friday's race Pietri got off in front, so there was no excuse for his defeat. Borrow also got off well, and he made all the running, being in front throughout the race. The winner was highly tried in the spring, but he certainly had no pretensions to win the Middle Park Plate on his recent running.

The two-year-old racing at Newmarket next week will be very interesting, but it is unfortunate that Seaforth is not entered for the Dewhurst Plate. There are forty-three entries for the Criterion Stakes, including Borrow (10 lb. extra), and if he starts he will no doubt be favourite. I shall expect Phryxus to win this race. There are fifty-eight entries for the Moulton Stakes, including Meleager, Borrow (8 lb. extra), Tullibardine, Porphyrio, Stedfast, Invicta, and Mary the Second. On last week's running Borrow must win, but on the First October form this race is obviously a better thing for Meleager or Invicta. Borrow is not engaged in the Dewhurst Plate, but the field may include Pietri, King William, Alice, Phryxus, Sunstar, Prince Palatine, and Romeo. After the Middle Park surprise owners will be encouraged to start animals which apparently can have no chance whatever. I shall predict the success of Alice or Prince Palatine. The Houghton Stakes has forty-five entries, and St. Nat should win.

Bayardo ought to find no difficulty in winning the Jockey Club Cup, there being neither penalties nor allowances in that race. Mr. Fairie's horse may also pick up the Limekiln Stakes, which should be won by St. Victrix or Royal Realm if Bayardo does not run.

The Free Handicap for three-year-olds has obtained only seven acceptances, and Willonyx will probably be the winner.

During the next week reams of paper will be covered with dissertations on the Cambridgeshire. The best advice that can be given to backers is to wait until the day, for at the finish there may be some unexpected developments. My original fancy was Electra, but her defeat at Manchester was not encouraging. Mr. Neumann's mare has been going exceedingly well at Newmarket. I expect that the Cambridgeshire will be won by either Whisk Broom or Thalia. Mr. Whitney's horse is probably now much better than he was when he finished third to Neil Gow and Lemberg for the Two Thousand. Thalia ran a good public trial at the First October Meeting, and if she had accomplished as much in a private gallop she would at once have been rushed to short odds.

After Doncaster I mentioned Tullibardine (who made an unsuccessful début at that meeting) as likely to win a good race in the course of the autumn. I hear that Mr. Buchanan's colt has been in reserve for the Great Sapling Plate at Sandown Park on Friday. He will have 17 lb. the best of the weights with Seaforth, Pietri, and Prince Palatine, and Hair Trigger II. gives him 15 lb. Tullibardine may have most to fear from Knockfeerna or Seaforth.

AMERICAN AND CANADIAN SPORT.

An Irish reader who says that he has pleasant memories of the slogging, to use his words, that I gave J. E. Sullivan and the other Yankee athletes over the Olympic games, has sent me the September number of The Athletic World, a Canadian monthly sporting magazine, in which there is a very interesting article about Mr. Sullivan. It is also a very libellous article. It contains a summary of statements that Mr. James B. Connolly has made in reference to Mr. Sullivan in the Metropolitan Magazine, an American publication. Now I am well aware that in the States libel actions are rarely taken. The Press there has a freedom that is not accorded in this country. Here libel actions are popular. Experientia docet. Wherefore I have no desire to encourage Mr. Sullivan to run a tilt with Truth by reproducing allegations from an American magazine which I am not myself in a position to substantiate. With the Amateur Athletic Union (U.S.A.), which Mr. Sullivan "bosses," our own A.A.A. has no relations. All the same, in the interests of international amateurism the statements in this article ought not to pass unnoticed by the A.A.A. and the British Olympic Council.

Leaving the Americans and their ways, I have been interested in the Canadian journal's articles on Canadian sport. And as a worn-out old Britisher let me beseech you, O my brothers of Canadian journalism, not to screech about yourselves so much. It sickens us just as much as our self-depreciatory methods ought to sicken you. There is really no need to spend half a dozen columns and heaven knows how many words in telling yourselves what a fine country and what fine fellows you are before you tell the geographically ignorant Britisher that the Royal Canadian Henley is held "on a course of a mile and a-half, adequate in width and naturally protected from storm disturbances along the whole length of the course by high wooded banks," and that the place is the disused Welland Canal, but a short distance down from St. Catherine's. All that fluff about yourselves is a fault from over the border. You are no doubt excellent fellows, but leave other people to say so and you will be more popular. And does the wind never blow up and down that funnel? And really you do not know everything. Your observation that "all of the famous old English colleges give every encouragement to the development of class in single scull and crew rowing" is as inaccurate as it is misleading. College rowing at the Universities is a most haphazard thing. Those who come up to the University and are no good at football and cricket, or running become oarsmen. Practically Eton is the only rowing school, with three or four men a year at Oxford and Cambridge from Radley. And if you saw the stagnant canal-like Cam, with its right angle corners and races rowed end on by time or by bumps because there is no room to row abreast, you would wonder how Cambridge ever won a race, and you would not think that the Argonauts were superhuman in winning the Stewards'. That wretched Cam cannot compare with your mighty canal with more than enough room for three abreast. And yet—do not be cross—finer fours have been sent out from the Cam than Canada or U.S.A. has ever produced. Yes, we welcome you here and wish we could go out to you. After all, when it came to the pinch the old country was in it, and fairly whacked the Belgians and others (including yourselves) when it came to the Olympic regatta. And when our vitriolic party press says Canada is fed up with us because our present political rulers will not do this and that, it is pleasant to see the regatta called Henley, and to read that three hundred yachtsmen of the Pacific North-West met at the annual International Yacht Regatta at Victoria, B.C., described as the "Cowes of Western Canada."

By the way, this is to give the captain of Leander notice that this same journal contains portraits of the Ottawa eight that won at Canada's Royal Henley this year. It says the crew will come to our Henley next year (Coronation year), and well, it and others would like a good race and a beating, and Mr. Camp, U.S.A., says English oarsmanship is waning. Mr. Harcourt Gold will please note.

If Miss Leitch and Mr. Hilton sigh for fresh fields to conquer, they can go to Canada for the Lambton International Golf Tournament, where there are prizes for all and disappointments for none. Cracks and crocks are alike welcome. For certain competitions there are flights. That is to say, first flight handicaps four and under, 5-10, 11-17, and 17 to X. The furthest X in the flights was a 25 man. Then in lawn tennis there is a protest about the late hour the championships begin.

They ought not to be arranged by five o'clock men. True, the writer says they have not reached the English standard, where a competitor has to be on hand for a megaphone call from the referee's tent from ten till dusk.

Perhaps the gem of the journal is the statement that polo is an equestrian game which may be shortly described as hockey on horseback.

As a hint for those who rightly complain of rough play in football, especially in professional matches, I may mention that this occurs in lacrosse matches. The players fight, and they are taken off to the police-court and heavily fined. A few police-court fines would soon stop deliberate foul play.

I doubt if any hospital ever put such a hot team into the Rugby football field as London Hospital did against the Old Merchant Taylors last Saturday. There were four English and two Scottish internationals and also Heale, who with any luck would have been capped two seasons ago. The Old Boys started without two of their advertised team; the two substitutes turned up ten minutes late. It was a fast hefty game, and the Old Boys, by a goal from a mark and a try to a goal and a try, lost one of the hardest games either team has played.

After being four down at the beginning of the fourth round, and promptly going to five down, Miss Leitch, with a half-stroke allowance and in a heavy wind, beat Mr. Hilton by two and one. She is certainly a splendid match player. It is singular that in both his second rounds Hilton fell off. He was certainly disappointing in his last round. He was erratic in his long game and weak in his short game. There was a lot of betting over the game, and it is a grievous burden for any man to know that he is carrying a lot of money at 4 to 1 on—and this was the betting at the beginning of the last round—even though he may not have a penny on himself. The crowds were tremendous, especially at the final round. Off the tee the players might have been addressing a mob instead of the ball. If people do not know how to restrain and behave themselves they had better stay away. The best way will be to charge gate money, and give good balances to the P.G.A.

ATALANTA OF THE LINKS.

I sing to the maiden of sprightly nineteen,
  Come, Lyre, put your liveliest lilt on.
A golfer, her prowess she's proved on the green
  And downed the redoubtable Hilton.

'Twas a triumph of coolness no less than of skill;
  When hole upon hole he was piling,
She kept a good heart in the struggle up hill,
  And fought on unruffled and smiling.

Time was when her chances success for to reach
  To zero had seemed to diminish.
Five down! But she stuck to him still—like a Leitch—
  And came with a rush at the finish.

Despite his superior masculine strength,
  And though classiest he of the classy,
On divers occasions she beat him for length
  With her feminine driver or brassie.

At the critical pinch a grand short game she played;
  As well carried out as intentioned;
She pitched with the skill of a Taylor or Braid;
  She putted like—some one unmentioned.

And so was the match fairly snatched from the fire
  By this wouldn't-be-downhearted missy;
Whose win her fair sisters will doubtless inspire
  To rival the doings of Cissie.

Look, then, to your laurels, O sex so-called "stern,"
  Else soon they'll be withered and shady!
Don't think yourself safe when you're up at the turn—
  If you're playing a match with a lady.

For in golf, as in life, the last word's to the fair,
  Whatever success you've begun with,
Of her knack for a spurt at the finish beware!
  You never can tell when she's done with.

So ere giving a half, ponder well in your soul
  The saw of the Ancient Greek fogey;
It applies; for "a half is (much) more than a hole"—
  To a damsel who makes light of Bogey.

Then here's to the maiden of sprightly nineteen!
  Come, Lyre, put your liveliest lilt on.
She's taken a half, and two holes, on the green
  Off Hoylake's redoubtable Hilton.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE TREASURY AND ITS FORMULA.

THE reported intention of the authorities to revise the horse-power formula at present adopted for taxing purposes is naturally causing considerable searching of hearts in motoring circles. It is not much to the credit of the Treasury that it should talk of altering already a formula which has only been in actual operation a few months. Such chopping and changing argues as little consideration for the public (for even the much-abused motor owner is a member of the public) as it does intelligence and business-like capacity on the part of the officials concerned. All the factors governing the matter were fully known before the existing formula—namely, that of the R.A.C.—was adopted, and, having adopted it, sheer self-respect, one might have thought, should have operated with the Government to prevent them from contemplating its alteration so quickly.

At the same time, there is no disguising the fact that the formula is one which, by taking no account of length of stroke, is a very lenient one. When it was devised, the possibilities of the long-stroke engine had not been realised, with the result that cars rated by this formula at 15-h.p. or 20-h.p., actually develop vastly more power than this. Only a week or so ago, for instance, a 20-h.p. Vauxhall attained a speed of over ninety-five miles an hour, and did 27½ miles at an average of over eighty-five miles an hour at Brooklands; and though these performances were doubtless exceptional, since the Vauxhall is an exceptional car, they indicate clearly enough the inadequacy of the existing formula as a means of ascertaining the power actually developed. Still, the Treasury knew all this beforehand, or ought to have done, and having adopted the formula in question and got their taxes, they might leave it at that for a time and give motorists a run for their money.

There are, moreover, other considerations. The present formula has resulted in wonderful efficiency being got out of small engines and light cars. Putting aside questions of revenue, it is certainly not desirable to adopt any policy calculated to alter this condition of things by penalising such efficiency. That is how the matter presents itself at any rate to the designer. "Here have I succeeded in doing wonders," he says in effect, "within the limits laid down, and now you are going to tax me all the more heavily in consequence." The stern-eyed Treasury expert would reply, I suppose, if he spoke quite candidly, "Not a bit of it. The formula was an absurd one in the first place, and we were fools to adopt it. In fact, we only did adopt it provisionally. What we want is to tax cars in respect of their actual power, and the existing system of rating does not give us this at all. Therefore we propose to modify it." He would then go on to argue, I suppose, that if owners want to continue using such powerful cars as they possess at present, they must pay for the luxury. Otherwise they must be content with smaller ones and go slower.

And this is conceivably what may come about if the existing formula is seriously altered—conceivably but not probably. For whatever formula be adopted, designers and makers will probably always prove themselves equal to the occasion. The standard of efficiency is always rising, and doubtless in 1920 an avaricious Treasury will still be striving in vain to find the ideal formula which will bring in the maximum amount of income to their coffers. But if this is really going to be their game, they certainly cannot be congratulated on having made a very brilliant start. By adopting a formula which was out of date before even they took it up, they have lost heavily in their first engagement, and it will be amusing to watch if they do very much better at the second attempt. I foresee, indeed, considerable fun for some time to come from the battle of brains which seems likely to be witnessed between the Treasury on the one hand and the trade on the other, and if it came to backing either party I should certainly not be disposed, taking one consideration with another, to put my money on the Treasury

One thing, however, is certain. If the present formula is revised the grossly unfair system of classification at present in vogue will have to be amended also, together with various other details of the existing law which make for hardship and injustice.

A correspondent writes:—

About the rule of the road. Driving in a fog or mist on a dark night with the driver sitting on the right, the only safe way is to hug the right-hand ditch. Yet this is against the rule of the road in England. Similarly in a town if the driver kept to the right he could hug the kerb much closer than he does now and pass vehicles going the same way much closer, both of which things would tend to economy of road space. Wonderful feats in the way of cutting in and passing vehicles coming towards you often prove to be impossible at the last moment, and consequently hinder traffic about as much as they help it. The advantages of keeping to the right would, therefore, seem to outweigh those of keeping to the left, especially as it would make one rule universal for all classes of traffic, including led horses and foot passengers. The idea that if traffic kept to the right drivers would have to sit on the left is typical of the difficulty that the English seem to have in grasping any other person's point of view.

The writer is not very polite. It is not a case of difficulty in grasping another point of view, but of weighing the pros and cons in a clear-headed and intelligent manner. I gave a good reason for the conclusion that if drivers sit on the right they should keep to the left. It is not a question of facilitating "wonderful feats in the way of cutting in and passing vehicles coming towards you," but of facilitating one of the commonest and most necessary of driving operations—namely, overtaking and passing other vehicles. This is a far more important matter than being able to "hug the ditch in a fog or mist"—a feat which can, as a matter of fact, be achieved almost as easily whether the driver sits on the right or the left. Similarly, a driver can keep his vehicle quite close to the kerb without any difficulty when driving under ordinary conditions, whichever side he sits. But, really, the weightiest argument in favour of our practice is the simple fact that, in spite of their natural prepossessions in favour of their own system, some of the leading French motorists are advocating its adoption.

LETTERS TO MY MOTHER-IN-LAW.

DEAR Mrs. P.,—Please tell my father-in-law that I appreciate his objections to James becoming an ornament of his country in Parliament, but that I never for a moment suggested his attempting to turn out Sir J. Simon. Quite apart from his political experience, Sir J. Simon—he sat next to me once at a dinner at Jules'—has an excellent presence, is brimming over with anecdote, and is the best mimic, within legal limits, I ever met. Poor James, I know, has only principles. Still, I think he would have done well in a safe constituency. He takes a decided line on the Osborne judgment, having stated to me succinctly that there was so much good on both sides. And with the Panhard—it is sold now, I am sorry to say—containing my little niece dressed as a railway porter, and with "Vote for Uncle" in large letters on the outside, and myself and the Duchess of Wonderland on the platform—she is only a very distant cousin, you know, but a Socialist and correspondingly keen on publicity—we ought to have done very well indeed.

I have not been down to Sunningdale since the day my caddy insisted on informing me after every shot what an average player would have accomplished under similar circumstances. But as James shows signs of getting fat, and as he insists on eating all the "stuffy" things, I thought the match between Miss Leitch and Mr. Hilton might stimulate him to more exercise. Miss Leitch won through sheer sportsmanship. I think the fact that everything was against her—wind, rain, petticoats, and flying hair—really cheered her up, if only by doubling the sympathies of the onlookers. When luck was against her she neither "groused" at the caddy for handing her the right club, nor did she show any well-timed signs of fainting to account for her deficiencies in play. I always think, by the way, that if you must attribute non-success in any game to causes outside mere play, the common corn, corroborated by a limp, is perhaps as plausible as any. Miss Leitch's difficulties with her petticoats showed forcibly the necessity of the polite feminine for knickerbockers—the divided skirt. Or, instead of offering his next lady opponent so many strokes Mr. Hilton might engage to wear a nice warm flannel petticoat, kilted or plain, according to fancy.

We used the tickets you sent us for the Town Planning Banquet given by the R.I.B.A. I was told I was to sit next to Mr. Simpson, who is responsible for the excellent organisation of the whole affair. He forgot, however, to organise me, which was unfortunate, as I should certainly have looked more in place smiling through garlands of smilax at the high table than did Mr. Leonard Stokes, Lord Redesdale, or even Mr. John Burns. As it was, I was near a woman with very nice new teeth, but, not content with leaving well alone, she had draped herself liberally with strings of round ivory-coloured beads, which inevitably suggested an extension of her achievement in American dentistry. The speeches were rather long, and I noticed the triumph of the natural instinct on the part of several members of the high table, who, however, always woke up the penultimate second before their turn came to lull the others with winged words. When James does get into Parliament, and I have to arrange banquets, I shall have the speeches during the meal—one course to each speaker—and I am confident that no one would exceed the time-limit. The guest of honour should have the privilege of missing the course he liked least, while the naturally prosy should be started off fasting at the very beginning.

I sometimes wish that the accident of birth had placed me among Mr. John Burns's constituents, if only to secure his practical sympathy in the difficulties of maintaining "the beautiful" on an inadequate allowance. Some of us paid an official visit to Dorchester House, to attune our minds to the standard of town-planning ideals. Even without the Alfred Stevens fireplace, the Velasquez, Titians, and so forth, even in spite of its over-ornamentation, I would much rather live there than in Chelsea—so that, in my case, at least, the conference has more than attained its object. I meant to ask Mr. Whitelaw Reid whether the fixtures included a ghost, but he was so busy receiving us with his peculiarly delightful and individual smile that for the first time I devoted myself to sorting out the pictures from the plans on gold-mounted fans.

Ghosts have a definite architectural value nowadays, and one of them led Mr. George Belcher to an important discovery. Sleeping in the ghost-room of a house he was restoring he saw the family ghost, which stopped short not only at its shoulders, but also at its knees. Now everybody knows the ghost with its head under its arm, but there is something unnatural about a ghost with no under-legs. On investigation, however, Mr. Belcher found that at some time the floor had been raised eighteen inches, and that the ghost had remained true to its "walk" at a sacrifice of exactly eighteen inches of ghosthood.

Architects are making great efforts against the noise-nuisance, but I fear it may result in much straining of the aural nerve to hear everything. Only the other day I heard a man say to his wife: "There comes the new silent motor-bus! Listen!"

Tell Caroline that my mother remembers morris-dancers quite well at Abingdon in Berkshire. I have dim remembrances myself of a man in a sort of leafy tea-cosy, who was, I suppose, Jack in the Green. Getting drunk at the finish was an integral part of the programme, and carried with it none of the self-conscious opprobrium of to-day. Thus I am a little doubtful as to the probable success of Caroline's public-spirited attempt to revive a simple and natural amusement, if she bowdlerises it both of its simplicity and of its nature. The giddy whirl of lectures with which she proposes to enlighten every step would hardly appeal to any one but New Thinkers or enthusiasts clothed in crewel-work. Nor would their desire to set an example generally, contribute to the whole-hearted spontaneity always demanded of the lower classes in such matters.

I am sorry that the girls are vexed at my father-in-law's "putting his foot down" about mixed hockey this season. But he is not alone in considering it a somewhat violent method of husband-getting. Experts declare that no man could enjoy mixed hockey for its own sake, for the simple reason that he does all the work. This seems to me to show a profound knowledge of the male sex. At the same time, if he really put his foot down after the fashion of my father-in-law, mixed hockey would die of spontaneous combustion, so to speak. There would be no husband-getting and incidentally no wife-getting for quite a long time during the winter months, and the consequent decrease in the marriage and birth rate should certainly save a good deal of unnecessary expenditure to the State. James says we ought to think imperially, even on such subjects as mixed hockey.—Your loving daughter-in-law,

TO LYDIA LANGUISH IN FURS.

You ask me what it is that in him stirs
  These feelings of unrest and silent anguish
Whene'er he sees you packed inside your furs,
  Dear Lydia Languish.

Perhaps he has a chill upon his chest,
  And sighs for furs like yours, ma chère Calypso,
Maybe that's why he harbours in his breast
  This pain that nips so.

It may be on the other hand a snuff
  Of some weird scent that enervates him, if he Has caught the little odour from your muff;
  I think it's whiffy.

Or else, October suns are in the skies;
  Winter's not here just now, so why the hurry?
Perhaps he thinks at present it's unwise
  To be so furry.

You might have worn them somewhere back in June
  (Although October's lately looking glummer);
Your boa would have served you just as soon
  Last so-called summer.

But bless you, Lydia! keep your furs, until
  The sameness of the things begins to bore you,
For your poor Pater's just received the bill,
  And paid it for you!

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Thursday.—Here I am at Newmarket, a duly established guest by special command and conduct of Diana, and—in the unbecoming clutches of that fiend influenza! Therefore I have to sit with my shoulders in shawls and my toes in cinders and my aching eyes blinking at a roaring fire in the intervals of wandering affectionately over the new grey and turquoise draperies of my bedroom, while my hostess and her friends are braving the elements and daring fortune, and watching the race, human and equine.

I was struck down, even as the heroine of a penny novelette, suddenly yesterday at the witching—the Cesarewitching—hour of three. An interfering parrot of an ancient retainer prophesied my early if not immediate decease did I not submit to a prompt course of bed, hot-water bottles, and quinine.

In the evening Diana looked in to console me, and assured me that I had missed little amusement or information or instruction in the noble art of frocks, everybody being in dark cloth or frieze gowns and long coats, with small cap-toques or large beaver hats. She had met the Dalmenys, and a big horde of Lambtons, Lady Noreen Bass, Mrs. Launcelot Lowther in a becoming hat trimmed with fur, Lady de Bathe in a superior veil, and the Marchioness of Londonderry in black velvet; and she had admired an obviously new bronze corduroy gown, sympathising deeply with its wearer when the rain drizzled disrespectfully upon it. She lost some money by backing her fancy for Admiral Togo III., and added insult to my sense of injury by declaring bed was a far, far better place than the historic heath in a blinding mist.

She has just been in to say the same thing all over again and to dance about in front of my looking-glass while she dressed her hair in plaits wound round her ears, a style popular, it would seem, in the 15th century, but strangely undeserving in the 20th. However, I did not mention that, for Diana seemed so pleased with it, and also with her evening gown of pale pink charmeuse made short with double tunics of pink and mauve chiffon fringed with bugles to match.

My hostess really looked far nicer in a tight-fitting princess dress of chiffon velvet in a pale shade of turquoise blue, patterned with a dwarf tree design and provided with a high square and long sleeves of ivory net dotted with tiny blue paillettes. To cheer my lonely hours she brought me a new blouse to inspect. It was made of dark blue chiffon overrun with a large conventional design of infinitesimal opalescent white beads, eminently suitable to accompany the blue serge coat and skirt. I registered it on the tablets of my weakened mind before closing my troubled day with a meagre dinner of a plate of hot soup, which I carefully served with hors d'œuvre of veronal en cachet.

Saturday.—I am a recovered wreck; Diana doubts whether I am worth the salvage, but then courtesy was never her strong point. However, she brought my remnants up to town this morning, and Joan met them with a really sympathetic manner, which was an ambulance in itself. I was quite strong enough to notice her new hat, which she told me she had bought at the Parisian Hat Company for the price of 30s. She begged me not to tell anyone how cheap it was, and I should never have guessed it. Made of black satin, it has a frill of lace beneath its bent brim and full crown, with a bunch of shaded hackle feathers at one side. She had just taken it to grace the Lister-Lovat wedding. Joan loved the bride's gown, with its tunic of old Rose point over ivory satin mousseline and a train of soft Renaissance brocade, with a chasuble of the Rose point lace hanging from the shoulders. The ceremony took place at the Oratory, and the reception at Downing Street. Everybody of consequence was there, and not a few notable nobodies. The two bridesmaids looked delightful in white chiffon and skunk and blue and silver sashes, and little Martin Wilson acted as page in a picturesque red suit.

I was carefully conveyed home by my attentive sister, and comfortingly assured that I looked dreadfully ill. I was laid out on the sofa in my least attractive dressing-gown of pale blue molleton flannel, with a white shirt front and collar, blue and white cords and tassels, and a border of fine white silk braid. Then I was severely lectured on the folly of stirring out of bed, and I was earnestly informed that it was impossible for me to go to the first night of the new play at the Duke of York's, and that therefore I must yield up my tickets with a good grace to my kind relations.

Sunday.—Virginia came to offer a little advice as to my future avoidance of race-meetings, and she held other amusing discourse on the joys and sorrows of her town and country social life, counting amongst the first the increased success of the Berkeley Bridge Club since it has moved into larger premises adjoining Prince's at Knightsbridge. She attributes this to the demand for penny bridge, and also to the possibility of being able to obtain within the precincts a light grill dinner, to say nothing of the moderate price of three guineas for the annual subscription, and the weekly Monday evening tournaments, which are most popular. And again she asked me, "Why don't you join it?" ignoring the fact that amongst my many minor vices is my inability to concentrate my wandering wits sufficiently to play bridge. I weakly denied that I considered myself superior in thus failing to perform one of woman's most obvious duties in the Edwardian and Georgian eras.

And then I think I went to sleep. I know I certainly seemed to be alone, and gladly remembered that I was within easy reach of my own bed.

Monday.—I woke to find myself well, and recollected that most people called upon me yesterday to offer me different remedies and infallible cures. One prescribed Brighton, and another Australia—a long sentence for so short an offence—and a third a rest cure in a home. Why this? I wondered, while I suspected myself of wearing a demented air.

Diana—and what Diana says is bound to happen—orders me to throw off my fictitious maladies and come with her party to Paris. I have demanded respite for at least a week, and have definitely made it a point of honour that she should invite some American to join us. I especially adore Paris when it is explained to me by Americans. They take me to see pictures instead of frocks, and they understand so much more of the latter than they do of the former, and they are apt to discover the architectural beauties of Notre Dame and the Madeleine, and discuss in odd moments the lowest social stratum, and their determination to devote some millions to its enlightenment. But I am forced to recall a famous legend about an old man and a donkey, for Joan in an autumn costume of purple ratine and much moleskin, arrived and peremptorily voiced her determination to convey me to Brighton by the four o'clock train to-morrow.

Whilst realising that an affectionate family may be embarrassing, I dressed myself in my new shaded chiffon blouse and my old velvet coat and skirt, and went to lunch at the Hyde Park Hotel with William; he has ever a soothing influence upon the nerves. We met Mary Moore in the hall, looking extremely pretty in black serge with a big black hat and some dainty lace about her throat. She very often lives at the Hyde Park Hotel when she is in London. It is supremely comfortable and unmistakably healthy and pleasant, with its fine view over the Row and its possibility of providing superlative quiet or endless entertainment. The resident servants there have excellent manners, too, not always to be found in their kind, and the food is even as Sam Weller said of something else "All werry capital."

After luncheon William and I sat in the Park watching the red leaves fall, thinking of the next green summer, and talking that mixture of romance and realism, of actresses and others, of guns and gossip, which is William's particular forte at present, and renders him such an easy and delightful companion for young and old of all sexes. Many women have been tempted to vow they'll use no other, but they are waiting William's acquiescence in the scheme.

He had been amused with a youngster of his acquaintance who had wandered to Nevada in search of golden fortunes, and had had rather a bad time there. His one definite opinion of travel was he would never again go outside the metropolitan radius without a return ticket. He is a typical gilded youth altogether, and is now seeking a flat, and has refused a most desirable residence over offices because he could not bear to think that he "might be disturbed by people coming in at nine o'clock in the morning."

William and I walked to the Carlton to tea, where we met many brilliant specimens of his kind accompanying beautiful damsels in velvet costumes with extinguishing beaver hats decked with tapestry ribbons and tapestry crowns, while they wore scarves of sable and ermine thick upon them; and carried monstrous muffs even as their French prototypes in the gay old days when the bright-eyed marmoset was as popular as the curly brown Pom of their descendants' delight.

Mrs. A.'s Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

Miss Marie.—I have posted your sketch and pattern, and hope you have duly received them. It is very nice of you to say what you do about my answers; I really enjoy interfering with other people's clothes. Remove all the silver sequins from the bodice, and have a tunic made of black net embroidered with iridescent beads, blue being the predominating colour. You can get the net by the yard in black with blue bugles, and could add a border and fringe, or you could buy a tunic ready-made from the shop you mention. Their things are excellent, but of course not cheap. I should prefer to the black feather fan a very small fan closely set with blue sequins. I like the scheme of the frock altogether, and I am sure it will be a great success, and original.

Mrs. Q.—The most popular decoration for the hair is a piece of broad black velvet held with a plaque of diamonds or enamel, and perhaps the most serious rival to this is a band of bugled net or chiffon. Very new is a pointed cap formed of a trellis of diamonds and outlined with jet beads; and trellised bands of all sorts of jewels are used to hold the curls round the back, fastening in the front or at the sides with cabochons. The wave in the hair is almost unnoticeable, but little groups of curls seem to escape from the flat bands in the centre of the back and over each ear.

THE UN-TENDER SEX.

Women are popularly supposed to live for love. How it is that the spinsters in those circumstances do not die off and thus solve the Superfluous Woman question no novelist or scientist has yet arisen to tell us. From Byron, declaring the natural superiority (or, rather, the superior comfort) of Man, of whose life love is a part, to Woman, whose whole existence it is asserted to be, down to the latest sentimental scribbler of to-day, the cry is always the same. This being so, it is odd to compare the attitude of women themselves to the very absorbing topic. Anything more unsentimental than the position of a number of modern women on the question of love it would be impossible to imagine. A popular fashion paper in Paris recently printed in its correspondence columns an inquiry from a lady of two-and-twenty as to what she ought to do in a predicament known to every novel reader and theatregoer since novels and plays existed. She loves one man, and her parents wish her to marry another, who loves her, but whom she hates. What ought she to do? Given a concourse of feminine answers, one would of course suppose that she would be told unanimously to stand out against her parents, and if she could not marry the right man to marry no one at all. The fact that these ladies are French does not account for the circumstance that only two advise her not to marry the man she dislikes. Of these, one simply tells her not to do it, and the other letter tells more of the writer than it gives of advice, for it consists of the sentence: "I am eighteen, and I feel I can do quite well without any husband." The rest with one accord say that love does not matter in marriage or that it will come after; in any case any chance of marriage must be snatched up whether love be present or not.

It is not only French ladies, either, who are thus cynical in their attitude. The majority of married women who have not reached the mellow days of middle age give the same advice, only that in England, where the modern spinster enjoys quite a good position, it is frequently varied by ladies who, like the French eighteen-year-old, feel they "can do quite well without any husband." Perhaps the growth of this attitude among women in recent years is very largely due to the rise of the novel and play that deal with the troubles of married people instead of with the rough course of true love before marriage. One young girl said the other day: "I don't mind Maugham, where the husbands always have flirtations, but Pinero and Sutro frighten me because they make it appear as if wives always have to be improper before they can keep their husbands."

Past generations were brought up on books which ended either with the cold tomb and a faithful lover living on to ninety with suffused eyes whenever the sun set or anything else affecting happened, or they closed with wedding bells. Modern fiction and modern drama soon left this behind and began with the honeymoon. Now they are in an even more terrifying phase; they take the relations of a couple some years married, and paint only too vividly the dreary, matter-of-fact way in which they take each other as a matter of course, except when there is some active reason for open warfare. The modern woman is essentially a playgoer and a novel-reader. She imbibes the wisdom of the epigrammatists and goes home a budding cynic, to bewilder her undramatic, undemonstrative husband with some shrewd statement, such as that the English husband treats legitimate love as an indecency to which he never refers, and illegitimate love as a stage in his education.

It is probably only excess of sentiment that is making women so cynical on the subject of love. The feeling has to go somewhere and express itself somehow, and since Esther Eccles, fainting as she buckled on her husband's sword, is completely out of fashion, there is nothing to do but to laugh off the whole matter and try as well as possible to defend one's life against the ravages of an emotion to which women feel themselves particularly designed to be victims. "When we fall out of love with each other——" said a honeymoon bride calmly to her husband, only to be interrupted by a hasty, "What a horrible thing to say! If you expect that, you'll do a lot to bring it to pass." "Ah! you see. Cross with me already! It is beginning!"

A good many women also regard love in the light of an exacting occupation for which they really have not the necessary time. In the French correspondence referred to above one lady counselled the questioner not to mind any question of indifference between her and her husband. "For," said she, "you have no idea what a bore an affectionate husband becomes." This recalls Zangwill's "The love of a good man is an intolerable bore." The modern woman lives almost entirely on her nerves. She wants excitement, and the placidity of her husband's affection is quite likely to exasperate her beyond measure. But probably the real reason of the modern woman's cynicism lies in the fact that in life to-day there is no time for raptures; love is out of fashion, and, this being so, women would very much rather not feel it, and consequently do their best to say exactly what they do not mean about it. It is a shock to any woman who has pretensions to being smart, for instance, to find that she harbours within her an early-Victorian emotion which interferes with her plans, rouses the deadliest kind of virtues of which she had never suspected herself, exposes her to any number of anxieties and emotional crises, and altogether sweeps away the careful barriers which it is every woman's duty to erect between the world (including herself) and her real nature. No wonder that women are out of conceit with this devastating influence, and when possible will dismiss the Cupids and roses of another day with some such remark as, "Love is an indigestive which no saccharine can remedy," or "In much marriage is much grief; and she that increaseth husbands increaseth divorce."

NEW FICTION.

An Irish brogue and a "preux chevalier" form a combination which, under the name of "Let the Roof Fall In" (Hutchinson, 6s.), is likely to be popular. Frank Danby is chiefly to be congratulated on having drawn for the nonce a sympathetic picture of a little Jew-lawyer, Mossy. Lord Ranmore is the apple of his mother's eye, and is killed at Sandown, leaving to his cousin Derry a packful of responsibilities. Lady Carrie Carlew represents the chief villain of the piece, and very nearly wrecks Derry's hard-won happiness. Minor villainesses show Frank Danby perhaps a trifle severe upon her characters. The sentiment of the book is, however, unexceptionable, and, particularly in its description of the half-smart set, it can be relied upon to amuse and to entertain.

Miss Jane Wardle has shown on four several occasions that she can tell a good story, and that she can portray character with all the sharp definition of an etching. In "The Little Gray Man" (Arnold, 6s.) she combines both these characteristics. The human and wonderfully egotistical Carfax in contrast with the ingenuous and sympathetic Gentry, the sardonic Mandevil and his charming vagabond brother form the main pegs of a story based on a career of villainy and humour. Miss Wardle seems to have a special knowledge of goose clubs, guinea-pigs, ancient houses, and bucket-shops. She knows her London as do few other writers, and her pungent humour plays equally round Carfax, who likes his meals, or Gentry, who gets painfully hot in everybody else's service. From the picture of the London landlady to Carfax's reflections on merit unrewarded "The Little Gray Man" grows in interest by leaps and bounds. This is a brilliant piece of satire.

Life on a P. and O. steamer has always lent itself to the lighter kind of novel, and "In Extenuation of Sybella" (Stanley Paul, 6s.) Miss Ursula A'Beckett describes with some humour the manœuvres of Sybella to secure a husband. Sybella lives in Kensington, has a small income, is twenty-seven, and apprehensive about getting settled. A millionaire and an Indian civil servant provide her with material for the voyage, which material she turns to the very best account. Miss A'Beckett has the gift of satirical observation, and Sybella provides amusing reading for those who are tired of morals and sex.

"Dives and Son" (Alston Rivers, 6s.) suggests from the beginning the wicked millionaire, unscrupulous in business, coldly ambitious for his son's advancement. But Mr. Ernest Davies should really note that there is psychology even in the feeblest of us. Arthur proposes to Lady Eileen at his father's suggestion, promptly falls in love with Leonie, begs Lady Eileen to release him, but finally marries her. Now, a person of so ductile a character does not stand up to his wicked father and bid him cease from evil-doing, under pain of being allowed to pay his son's handsome allowance no longer. I cannot believe that Arthur and Eileen lived happily ever after, or that, indeed, they ever lived at all.

UPSTAIRS AND DOWNSTAIRS.

The treatment of windows in England has undergone a great change during the last few years, as one may see by the kind of curtains shown at up-to-date shops, and even by the dreadful little made-up bows, rosettes, butterflies, spiders, and other devices, each more abominable than the last, which are sold for holding curtains back. Perhaps our sense of privacy is becoming amenable to common sense and an increased liking for fresh air and good light. At any rate we no longer see window panes closely shrouded in muslin, behind which folds of lace, muslin, or net hang sheer from the ceiling to the ground, to be further barricaded by plush or velvet curtains.

In very narrow streets and on the ground floor it is necessary to interpose some screen between oneself and a casual public, which is always ready to be diverted from its legitimate business by the sight of some one eating or laughing, or poking the fire. In these cases the heavy paraphernalia of past times is now replaced by brise-bise curtains on the lower part of the window. For this purpose an odd little device, suitable only for a bijou house, of the kind which is painted white and has a green hall-door with very bright brass knocker, consists of a series of little frills about three inches deep in white muslin, sewn at either side to a piece of white ribbon, which is then drawn tightly down from the upper to the lower sash. The advantage of this curtain is that it is the same both sides, one frill just touching the top of the next.

Another pretty idea is drawn-thread work done on white or cream-coloured ground, with thread harmonising with the decoration of the room. With these little curtains it is only necessary to have a deep valance depending from the window-pole. In fact, everything is now made to look as airy as possible, and the dusty mixtures of serge and silk find no favour with us. We want to get as far as possible from the kind of window arrangement which finds its deadliest form in the conjunction of art serge and a castor-oil plant, a combination which inevitably suggests a long crochet antimacassar spread over the sinister and inhospitable shininess of an American leather couch.

People are always grumbling about the difficulty of getting good provisions of the dairy order, and at the recent Dairy Show a critic was lamenting that the British Dairy Association had done nothing to standardise English butter. It seems extraordinary that England should not have devised some method of keeping her produce up to a certain standard. Ireland, on which the average English person looks with the tolerant carelessness of an adult for a child, has not only started a depot in London where all her produce, from poems to eggs, can be obtained, but has inaugurated an Irish trade-mark which is rapidly becoming known as a guarantee of origin, and therefore of course tends to make those who use it keep their goods to a high standard. I looked into the whole question of the Irish trade-mark a little while ago, and found it so simple, so efficacious (and what is more, it has been such a commercial success), that it is very puzzling to find England always lamenting variability in provisions, and yet not taking the easy way which has been pointed out to them of removing this objection. We should soon hear no more of over-percentage of water in butter if there was some mark in addition to the firm's private mark, which acted as a defence and a guarantee at one and the same time.

This is the time of year when hare is at its best. The classic "jug" is always a favourite, though few people seem to know how to get the full richness from it. Being dry flesh it ought to have liquid added to it or fat. Red wine is delicious with it. Long, slow cooking is essential, and in fact hare is invariably better after two cookings than after one. Other ways of cooking hare, and leveret, when the latter is not too young, may be useful just now. The darioles are delicious, and do away with the problem of tiny bones which vex other dishes of hare.

Darioles of Hare.—Pound about 8 ozs. of the flesh of a hare, the remainder can be kept for soup, adding 2 ozs. of butter, two tablespoonfuls of cold brown sauce, and salt and pepper to season. When it has been well pounded, mix in an egg and a yolk, then rub it through a wire sieve into a basin, mix it, working it briskly with a wooden spoon, adding a gill of cream at intervals. Blanch a small portion to ascertain if it is of a delicate consistency If it should be too stiff, add a little cream; if, on the contrary, it is too soft, add the yolk of an egg. Butter eight small dariole moulds, put a little chopped truffle at the bottom of each, fill them with the hare, and steam them with a greased paper over them without allowing them to boil. Dish the darioles in a circle on an entrée dish, first making a circle with warm glaze, garnish the centre with diamond-shaped French beans, previously boiled and tossed in butter, add a spoonful of chopped truffle to the sauce, and pour it round the darioles.

Sauce à l'Impériale.—Simmer the chopped bones of a hare with stock, vegetables, herbs, and a ham bone for some hours to make essence, which strain through a cloth. Put a minced onion, a chopped shalot, half a stick of shred celery, 1 oz. of minced lean ham, and 2 ozs. of butter into a stewpan, and fry them until they acquire a delicate brown colour; mix in two

KOH-I-NOOR HOUSE, KINGSWAY,

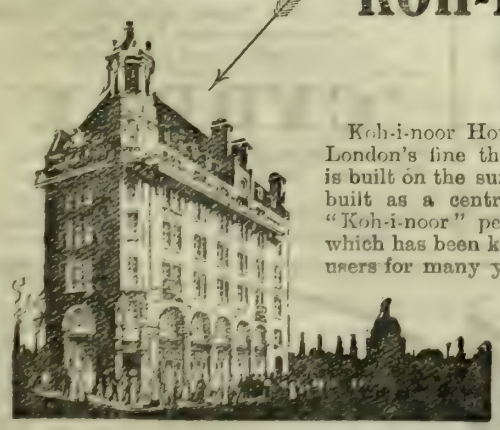
The new London Home of the World-famous "Koh-i-noor" Pencils.



Koh-i-noor House, the new landmark in London's fine thoroughfare the Kingsway, is built on the surest of foundations. It is built as a centre for the supply of the "Koh-i-noor" pencil, the proved merit of which has been known to millions of pencil users for many years. Visitors to London, passing down the Kingsway, may see at Koh-i-noor House a display of the many different forms of pencil which the "Koh-i-noor" takes for the convenience of users. The great merit of the "Koh-i-noor," as a writing or drawing instrument, is that it is always of one quality—the actual best.

"Koh-i-noor" Pencils are 4d. each, or 3/6 per dozen. Made in 17 degrees. Of Stationers, etc. List free from L. & C. Hardtmuth, Ltd., Koh-i-noor House, Kingsway, London. (Paris, Vienna, Dresden, Milan, Brussels, New York.)

The "Koh-i-noor" Pocket Propelling Pencils can be had in a variety of delightful and novel styles from 9d. each.

tablespoonfuls of flour and the strained stock, stir it till it boils, simmer it for an hour, and squeeze it through a tammy. Reduce the sauce with a glass of claret, a tablespoonful of red currant jelly, a teaspoonful of lemon juice, and a pinch of cayenne pepper.

Pain of Hare à l'Impériale.—Cook the fillets of a hare with butter, salt, pepper, and stock in a covered stewpan and place them aside. The bones of the hare should meanwhile be stewed to make stock for the sauce. Pound the flesh, adding a third of its volume of panada, 2 ozs. of butter, a spoonful of cold brown sauce, and when all has been thoroughly amalgamated work in two eggs and rub it through a wire sieve. Work the quenelle in a basin, adding half a gill of cream, and with it line a plain charlotte mould, previously decorated with cut truffle, garnish the centre with the fillets, which must be cut into fine dice, mixed with a little sauce, chopped truffle, and the yolk of an egg. Cover the garnish with the farce, twist a paper over the mould, and steam it three-quarters of an hour. Un-mould it on a hot dish and pour round it a little Impériale sauce.

The Stock is to be redeemed by the Company at par on the 16th October, 1935, but any part thereof may at any time after the 15th October, 1917, be redeemed at the option of the Company at 105 per cent. on three calendar months' notice in writing.

Interest on the Debenture Stock will be payable half-yearly on the 15th April and the 15th October. The first instalment will be payable on the 15th April, 1911, and will be calculated from the dates fixed for payment of the several instalments.

On or at any time before the 15th October, 1917, any registered holder of Stock may by notice in writing to the Company direct the Company to issue to him four fully paid up Ordinary Shares of £1 each in the Company, part of its unissued Capital, against the surrender of £5 of fully paid Stock held by him. Such Shares will rank for dividend, and the interest on the surrendered Stock will cease to run as from the date of the surrender.

The Stock will be secured by a Trust Deed giving a floating charge over the Company's undertaking, property, and assets for the time being, both present and future, including its uncalled Capital.

In the event of the security becoming enforceable the Stock will be repayable at par, except in the case of a voluntary winding-up of the Company for the purpose of amalgamation or reconstruction, in which case it will be repayable at the rate of 105 per cent.

By the Trust Deed the Company will undertake to set aside out of its surplus net profits in each year, commencing with the year 1911, after providing for administrative and working expenses, maintenance repairs, depreciation and renewal funds, and all other sums properly chargeable to revenue account, and after payment of a dividend of 6 per cent. for the year on the Company's Shares (but before carrying any sum to reserve) a sum equal to 10 per cent. of the surplus of such profits to form a sinking fund for the redemption of the Stock.

The moneys from time to time standing to the credit of the Sinking Fund are to be applied in providing for the redemption of the Stock, and may be applied at any time in the redemption of Stock at 105 per cent. at any time after the 15th October, 1917, or in purchasing Stock in the market, or by tender at any price below 105 per cent.

Power is reserved to the Company to make arrangements with the Government of Kelantan for the surrender of all or any of the rights under its concession, on such terms as it thinks fit, but in that event so much of the consideration as, together with the amount of cash and investments then standing to the credit of the Sinking Fund, will be equivalent to the nominal amount of the Stock outstanding, will be carried to the Sinking Fund and dealt with as part thereof.

Scrip will be issued in respect of the Stock after allotment, and will be exchanged for definite certificates on the completion of the payments for the Stock.

A part of the proceeds of this issue sufficient to redeem at 105 per cent. the outstanding Debenture Stock of the Company for £54,730, or the portion thereof not exchanged for Shares of the Company, will be deposited with the Trustees and applied in such redemption when the notices to redeem expire. The holders of the outstanding Stock have the right up to the time of redemption of calling for fully-paid Shares of the Company at par in redemption of their Stock.

The proceeds of this issue after redemption of the existing Debenture Stock and defraying the expenses of the present issue will be applied in the general development of the Company's property, and will enable the Company to complete the planting of and to bring into bearing 5,000 acres of Hevea Rubber Trees.

DESCRIPTION OF THE COMPANY'S RIGHTS.

The Company was registered on the 18th February, 1903, for the purpose of acquiring, working, and developing the concessions granted by the Rajah of Kelantan to Mr. R. W. Duff.

The concession in question is briefly summarised in the full Prospectus.

LEASEHOLD LANDS.—The Company has by its nominee recently obtained agreements for leases for 999 years (in which the Government of the State concurs) over carefully selected areas within the limits of the Concession comprising 50,000 acres of land, admirably adapted for the cultivation of rubber, free of cost to the Company so long as the leases are held in trust for the Company, and thereafter at a rental of one dollar per acre per annum payable until the 10th October, 1940, to the Company, and after that date to the Government and subject only to the usual planting conditions in force in the State of Kelantan. These leases confer surface rights only, but until 1940 the Company will enjoy in respect of the property comprised therein all the rights conferred by the Concession.

Twelve hundred and forty-two acres of this land have already been planted with Hevea Brasiliensis, particulars of which are as follows:—

| Acres. | Age (approximate). |
|---|---|
| 53 acres ..... | 4 years old. |
| 530 acres ..... | 3 years old. |
| 100 acres ..... | 2 years old. |
| 39 acres ..... | 6 months old. |
| 20 acres ..... | under 6 months old. |
| Total 1,242 acres. | |

A further area of 800 acres has been cleared for the purpose of being planted this season.

The leasehold lands have recently been visited by Mr. A. Irving, of Selangor, a well-known planter of fourteen years' experience in the Federated Malay States. Mr. Irving inspected 15,000 acres, which include the planted area referred to, and reported most favourably thereon. His valuation thereof amounts to £138,363. Taking the value of the remaining leasehold 35,000 acres to be only £2 per acre, the total estimated value of the 50,000 acres selected is £208,363.

As a sufficient sum from the present issue will be devoted to extending the existing Plantations to 5,000 acres, and as it is expected that this acreage will be fully planted by December, 1912, the Directors estimate that the following yields of rubber will be obtained:—

|---|---|---|
| 1911..... | 7,000 lbs. | from present planted area. |
| 1912..... | 63,600 lbs. | do. |
| 1913..... | 131,900 lbs. | do. |
| 1914..... | 254,100 lbs. | do. |
| 1915..... | 451,000 lbs. | do. |
| 1916..... | 744,900 lbs. | from 3,700 acres. |
| 1917..... | 1,178,800 lbs. | from 5,000 acres. |
| | 2,831,300 lbs. | |

Allowing the full rate of 1s. 6d. per lb. as the cost of placing on the market, and taking the most conservative basis for the future price of rubber, the following profits per lb. of rubber should easily be realised:—

| 1911 | 1912 | 1913 | 1914 | 1915 | 1916 | 1917 |
| 4/- | 3/3 | 2/9 | 2/3 | 1/9 | 1/9 | 1/6 |

Even on this very low basis the estimated yield will produce during the next seven years a profit of £251,508.

ALIENATED LANDS.—The Company, conjointly with the Government, grants agricultural leases for land within its territory for terms extending to 999 years, all rents and one-half the export duty on rubber being paid to the Company during the period of its Concession.

The Company has already alienated 15,000 acres on these terms, and has received applications for further large areas.

MINERALS.—The Company has the sole right to work minerals throughout its territory until the 10th October, 1940.

GENERAL.—The Directors feel it difficult to arrive at a definite valuation of the Company's rights, other than its plantations and leasehold rights, as it is impossible to arrive at a fair deduction of future value from the Company's experience in the past, the circumstances being entirely changed by reason of the country having been recently taken under British protection. They have nevertheless gone carefully into the question with the Managing Director, who, on the basis of returns which he considers must certainly be expected in the future, states that he considers that the present value of the following rights of the Company—that is to say, revenue farms, rents to be received from agricultural lands, including native holdings (but exclusive of the Company's leasehold), export duties on rubber exported by the Company's lessees, but not including the rebate on rubber exported by the Company itself, revenue to be derived from royalties and jungle produce, export duties on cattle and taxes on paddy and cocoanuts, may be safely estimated at £300,000.

DREDGES, BUILDINGS, MACHINERY, AND PLANT.

The Company's four dredges are maintained in good working order, and steps are being taken which it is hoped will result in a considerable extension of the present ascertained payable area of alluvial ground.

The Company's Saw Mill during the first eight months of the current year turned out 42,000 cubic feet of sawn timber. The demand for timber, which already exceeds the supply, is increasing, and plant and machinery which will treble the capacity of the mill have been ordered and will shortly be shipped. The timber on the Company's Concession is abundant and constitutes a very valuable asset.

The Company's Machine Shop is complete, and is sufficient for all the ordinary requirements of the Company and to deal with outside orders.

The Company's buildings distributed over the country include Offices, Wharves, Warehouses, quarters for European Staff, Hospitals, and Coolie Lines.

TRANSPORT.

The Company has organised an effective system of transport, and holds the mail contract between the interior and the port Kuala Kelantan, whence there is a regular service of mail steamers to Singapore.

Full Prospectus (upon the terms of which alone applications will be received) and forms of application can be obtained at the Company's Offices, and from the Bankers, Brokers, and Solicitors of the Company.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,653.

I am indebted for the subject of this week's competition to an obliging correspondent.

He suggests that an interesting puzzle might be got out of setting competitors to submit an ambiguous phrase, capable of a variety of meanings, as for examples, "He went for a soldier," which might mean

(i.) That he enlisted.
(ii.) That he went to fetch a soldier.
(iii.) That he went on behalf of a soldier.
(iv.) That he attacked a soldier.

I quite agree with my correspondent that we have here the making of a very good puzzle, and I am offering this week the usual prize of Two Guineas to that competitor who shall prove most successful in SUBMITTING AN AMBIGUOUS PHRASE, IN THE KING'S ENGLISH, THAT SHALL BE SUSCEPTIBLE OF THE GREATEST POSSIBLE VARIETY OF INTERPRETATIONS.

I need scarcely say that the example quoted above is not eligible for this competition.

Each competitor may submit two, but not more than two, ambiguous phrases.

All ambiguous phrases must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, October 31.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Buildings, Carteret Street, Queen Anne's Gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom-de-plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on postcards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand, whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name, with the address, of KLONDYKE, winner of one-half of TRUTH Prize No. 1,645 is Mrs. Dawe, Walkington Rectory, Beverley, Yorks.

PIRIHITENE.—Many thanks for your letter. I am glad you concur in the accuracy of my figures. It is necessary, in such competitions, to work on some method; and it seemed to me that the method I adopted was, on the whole, fairest. I hope that before long you may do better than proxime accessit.

H. D. K.—"Wind" (pronounced like "skinned") is certainly a good example of onomatopœia. Why the poets make it rhyme with "blind" I don't know; except that, thus pronounced, there are many more rhymes for it; which is, after all, an imperative consideration with poets. Now that you have begun to take TRUTH regularly, I hope you will take part in our weekly competitions. The address from which you write is familiar to me as that of one of my oldest and most valued competitors.

W. J. S.—I note the misprint of "rough" for "sough," and will take it into account when adjudicating.

HATTERSLEY.—Many thanks for your capital suggestion, which you will see I have adopted.

VARIOUS PRIZE AWARDS WILL BE ANNOUNCED NEXT WEEK.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1650.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

LETTERS CONTAINING AN OFFER OF MARRIAGE.

Club, Pall Mall,
October, 1910.

DEAR MISS BLANCHE.—The small volume which I am enclosing with this may, I trust, prove interesting. If so, please keep it for its own sake if not for that of the sender, who would fain hope for the privilege of offering many other and better gifts for your future acceptance.

I had almost written "My Dear Blanche." Pray tell me if you think I might have felt justified in doing so. If not, pray forgive the liberty taken in indulging in such a thought and visit not the offence upon me, but believe me, ever your devoted friend,

REGINALD (Tom Nissed).

17, Fenchurch Street, E.C.,
October 10, 1910.

MY DEAR MISS GRAHAME,—Yesterday I was with you at this time, and it is hard to realise that I shall not see you again for some months.

The last few weeks have been very delightful, and the only alleviating point about returning to business monotony is the fact that I have a greater incentive to work now than I have hitherto entertained.

To obtain the jewels of this world one must be able first to present them with an adequate setting, and, apart from ambition, I find that the time has come when work will be necessary as a means of temporary oblivion from ambitions and hopes which often torture because of the fear that they can never be fulfilled. I am sending you some red carnations, which should reach you to-morrow, and, with kindest regards to you and your mother, believe me, sincerely yours,

WYNFORD TREE (Sea-Gull).

Antecedents.—Alf, a college friend, stays a week with his friend in a country house, where his friend's sister "Topsy" is in charge, with whom he falls in love. On leaving he writes:—

MY DEAR TOPSY,—I am writing to thank you for the most enjoyable visit of my life. Since you so kindly told me that you would treat me as one of the family I have ventured to use their prerogative in addressing you, and even dare to hope that the privilege may be always mine.

It rests with you to say, since I am, most devotedly yours,

ALF (Dorset).

DEAR MISS CAPULET,—Many happy returns of the day. I wanted to send some flowers—"Manners for Men" says I may—but the selection bothered me. You see, every flower has a meaning, so it's well to be careful; and the expert I have consulted is most discouraging. It seems that unless thoroughly up in the subject it is quite easy to make the most serious mistakes—to say, for instance, "Darling Juliet, I love you from the top of your sunny head to the tips of your dainty feet," when really one ought only to say, "Nice weather for crops." I pictured you sending back a lump of ragwort or chickweed, or whatever means, "Sir, you are impertinent," and funked trying the experiment without first warning you. Of course, if, knowing my limitations, you are prepared to take the risk, I am yours to command,

ROMEO MONTAGUE (Cadi).

MY DEAR MISS SNOOKS,—I fear you must have found me an absent-minded companion to-day. Still, I thought I detected in you a sympathy which encourages me to confide my affairs in you. The fact is, I am in love. Does that surprise you? To me it seems inevitable. But, being an ordinary silly man, while she is an angel, how can I tell her what I feel without imperilling that present intimacy that I value so highly?

What signs of favour should I look for in her whom I long to worship?

What can I do to show her my feelings without risking exile from her presence altogether?

Do give me your true advice, for I feel that you know me well enough to tell me plainly what I ought to do. Will you?

Yours very sincerely,

CORNELIUS JONES (Tatcho).

MY DEAR MISS COOL,—Would you be most unselfish and write me for the next fortnight whilst I am away. Please don't talk any nonsense about not writing to men friends. I consider myself more than an ordinary friend. We have seen a lot of each other for the past six months, and have managed to pull together all right. Besides, you told me I never get on your nerves. I would like to put that to the test. You have also told me that our friendship must cease when one of us gets engaged. Now, you were only partly right, for suppose we both get engaged at the same time. Surely our friendship need only undergo a slight change. Am I not right? Please let me know what you think.—Yours,

H. HOTHEART (Yip).

DEAR MISS JONES,—You will probably be surprised to receive this letter, but I know I shall awaken a sympathetic chord in your breast when I inform you that it comes from one who feels the aching loneliness of a bachelor existence so much that he is impelled to open his heart to one for whom he has the most sincere regard and esteem.

Solicitude for your happiness, dear Miss Jones, is the sole excuse I have to offer for my action. If you reciprocate that feeling and would desire to relieve the monotony of my lonely life it would give me a world of delight to receive a few lines from you, telling me that my boldness in addressing you has been forgiven, and that I am at liberty to renew the correspondence thus unconventionally commenced.—Believe me, dear Miss Jones, your sincere and devoted friend,

JOHN SMYTH (Belfastiensis).

Brandon, Suffolk,
Monday.

DEAR MISS SHERER,—It seems quite a long time since we last met, though I daresay the days have flown for you in town. I expect you have made a lot of new friends during your stay there, though I hope you won't forget old ones on that account. As you were kind enough to sympathise with me over my failure to get into the Service, I'm writing to tell you of a stroke of luck I've had. My uncle in Australia has offered me a good billet out there in Melbourne, and I shall be sailing in a few months. My one and greatest regret is to have to leave old friends behind, but perhaps even that might not be altogether insurmountable.—With kind regards, yours very sincerely,

DICK MERCER (Olive).

Hope Villa, Wyrland,
October 3, 1910.

DEAR MISS SWAN,—Having picked up a handkerchief with the name of "Angelina" worked in the corner, I venture to enclose it to you, knowing that to be your name, and expressing as it does what you must be to one who loves you. Knowing your taste for botany, I also beg your acceptance of some flowers from my garden, called "Love in a mist," begging that if you will accept the offering in the spirit in which it is sent you will honour me by placing in my unworthy hands some of the beautiful "Heartsease" from your own garden.—Pray believe me, yours most faithfully,

CŒLIBS FORTESCUE (C. E. S. E.).

February 14, ——.

CARA AMICA,—Your temporary absence occasions my venturing to address you thus and also realising fully the affection which has taken possession of me, and the degree in which my happiness depends on your society.

I am impelled to confess this, confiding in your kindly friendship not to resent my frankness or misunderstand my motives. Your departure seems like the setting of the sun. I try to look forward with patience to your return, but this anticipated joy has a shadow thrown across it, since other absences may follow and my light may suffer eclipse.

The gems in their casket have vouchsafed me many glimpses of their sparkling, but they are remote from my touch and locked away as it were from all claim to them as gifts. Here is a problem to be solved—a treasury to be opened. There is a key! Say, shall we find it?

AMICUS (Knemis).

MY DEAR ANGELA,—I must write, as I am so desirous of hearing from you, what you are doing, your very thoughts and feelings. It is superfluous to say how I miss you, that I feel quite lonesome and even miserable. I should like, dear Angela, to open my heart to you. As your name imparts, you are in my eyes a perfect angel. It is hard to write plainly, but to me still harder not to; yet I would die sooner than offend you. I went to a play at the Town Hall—"Love's Labour Lost." May such never be my unfortunate lot. May my love sooner or later be reciprocated by someone whom I adore. Do write back very soon, kindly—I know you will do that—and may I hope favourably, to your very humble and devoted admirer,

A. W. (Simplex).

MY DEAR GERTIE,—I cannot tell you how much I enjoyed our evening together at the theatre, and I can only hope sincerely that the happiness was mutual. I met your father and your brother Jack in town to-day, and they were kind enough to invite me to spend the week-end with you all at Brigrton. You know, I feel sure, that it will give me a vast amount of pleasure to accept, for you must be aware of the deep affection I have for all of you.

I do so wish to speak to you on Thursday upon a matter which is dear to my heart, but it was one I found difficult indeed to broach. However, I am hoping I may see you on Saturday. Perhaps you could let me hear from you before then?—Believe me, my dear Gertie, always affectionately,

FRANK (Ephesea).

DEAR MISS B.,—The remembrance of our last delightful conversation is ever with me, and the feeling that we ought to be staunch friends is strong, for is not mutual agreement one of the chief elements of a true and lasting friendship? Do we not find this in ourselves? Our interest in the same things, our appreciation of the same books, our outlook on life generally from the same standpoint—all these make for a companionship which will always be sweet; how close it may be rests with you. The future is bright with hope when I think how life gains added charm in that so much of my happiness lies in your hands.

With real friends no such thing as "misunderstanding" exists. One of the greatest blessings that real friendship possesses is that one may always speak freely and without reserve. Do you not agree?—Yours always sincerely,

Y. Z. (Sutherland).

My Dear Gwladys,—I wonder if you can tell me why I have put off writing this letter so long? The strange part of it is that if I ever want an answer to an important question I do not hesitate in asking for it. However, I know you are able to read the thoughts of those you are interested in, so I hope you will be able to answer this conundrum:—

Puzzle Editor of Truth,
Carteret Street,
Queen Anne's Gate,
London, S.W.

Well, here I am, home again, and I more than ever feel the contrast of cheerful companionship to the lonely life I usually live. I brood and ask myself, "Must it always be thus?" I can hear a familiar voice, like the voice that breathed o'er Eden, whisper words that bring hope to my lonely and despairing heart. But I fear I am boring you with my selfish aspirations; if so, I crave your forgiveness, which I await with much trepidation, and remain, yours ever, Frank Lee (Timid).

My Miss Onley,—Pray pardon the great liberty I take in writing you, but, having known you for so long (nearly three whole weeks), I should be so very, very glad, so highly honoured, if you would accept a ring from me as a small present.

It is a half-hoop ring—that is, hoop outside and flat within, just like one my poor father gave to dear mother on their first wedding day.

I would not presume to offer it to you only that, from what I noticed the other night of your beautiful finger (third, left hand), I feel sure there is nobody, nobody whom it would fit so well or that I should be so proud, so proud, to offer it to as (of course) a perfect fit.—Believe me, yours, dear Miss Onley,

I. M. Loncly.

Dear Miss Muir,—I have just heard that you returned last night from your visit to Scotland. I trust you found your aunt well and that you enjoyed yourself.

It seems much longer than three weeks since you left, and I have found London almost unbearable lately.

Can you arrange to meet me to-morrow (Thursday) for a short time, as I have something very important to ask you?

I shall be at the Albert Gate entrance to Hyde Park at 3 o'clock, and shall anxiously await you there.—Believe me to always remain, yours very sincerely,

T. H. Ansell (Rover).

*There are some 7,700 well-established Rubber Trees planted in this area, chiefly alongside roads and ravines.

The number of Para Rubber Trees on the above area of 1,726 acres is about 323,800, making with the above-mentioned 7,700 trees, a total of 331,500 trees or thereabouts.

The foregoing particulars of the Estates to be acquired by the Company are based on Reports by Mr. J. P. Anderson, of Ceylon, the well-known Visiting Agent, dated 19th April, 23rd June, 20th June, and 20th June, 1910, respectively, and confirmed as to the number of trees by census returns supplied by Messrs. Carson and Co.

WORKING CAPITAL.—The whole of the proceeds of the present issue, after payment of the preliminary expenses, will be available as Working Capital, and will be applied in meeting the cost of bringing the young rubber into bearing (including cultivation), in equipping the properties with all necessary additional factories and other buildings and machinery for the preparation of rubber, and in acquiring and planting up an additional area of 650 acres or thereabouts with Para rubber or tea. Negotiations for the acquisition of this area, which adjoins the above Estates, have already made considerable progress.

LABOUR.—The Estates being situate in the Kelani Valley and near the Railway, transport arrangements are excellent, and the supply of labour is ample for present requirements.

RAINFALL.—The average rainfall on the Estates is about 150 inches per annum.

ESTIMATED YIELD.—The Directors consider that the following estimates of the output of dry rubber from the combined Estates are conservative:—

| 1910. (Half-year) | 1911. | 1912. | 1913. | 1914. |
| 10,000 lbs. | 65,000 lbs. | 160,000 lbs. | 300,000 lbs. | 400,000 lbs. |

The tea-crops are estimated at about 650 lbs. per acre or about 190,000 lbs. per annum, and the net profit from tea at about £1,300 per annum.

FORWARD SALES.—The Manikande Rubber Co., Limited, has sold 7,000 lbs. of the 1911 crops at Rs.5 (6s. 8d.) per lb. delivered in Colombo, but no other contracts for forward sales have been made.

PURCHASE PRICE.—The purchase price has been fixed by the Vendors at £135,141, and will be satisfied by the allotment and issue to the Vendors or their nominees of 135,141 fully-paid shares of £1 each, and the Company will in addition take over all the current liabilities of the Vendors in connection with the properties, as on the 1st day of July, 1910.

The purchase price includes not only the Estates with all growing trees thereon, but also all buildings, factories, fixtures, crops (except those harvested in the ordinary course prior to the 1st day of July, 1910), stores, implements, live and dead stock, and the outstanding coast advances, believed to be worth £2,218, but not cash at bank or in hand.

The minimum subscription upon which the Directors may go to allotment has been fixed by the Articles of Association at 500 shares, but the Directors will not go to allotment unless 40,000 at least of the 50,000 shares now offered are subscribed.

The preliminary expenses, which are estimated at £3,500, and will be paid by the Company, include (inter alia) registration fees, printing, advertising and circulating this Prospectus, legal expenses, and stamp duties in England and Ceylon, and brokers' fees.

No underwriting contracts have been or will be entered into, but a brokerage of 3d. per Share will be paid by the Company in respect of all allotments made in respect of applications identified as coming through Brokers, Bankers, and other approved Agents.

Application will be made in due course to the Committee of the Stock Exchange, London, for a settlement of the Shares in the Company.

Copies of the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company and of the above-mentioned Contracts, Reports, and Census Returns can be inspected at the offices, 31, Lombard Street, London, E.C., of Messrs. Stephenson, Harwood, and Co., the Solicitors of the Company, at any time during business hours whilst the list remains open.

Full Prospectuses (upon the terms of which applications will alone be received) and Forms of Application for Shares may be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers, and Solicitors, and at the Offices of the Company.

Dated 15th October, 1910.

ENTRE NOUS.

My recent appeal to the kind offices of my lady readers in reference to the dressing of dolls for the Truth Toy Show has met with a response from many quarters, but I am compelled to renew the appeal, for there are still some hundreds of small dolls on hand, and Christmas is coming rapidly. It has unfortunately happened that a lady, who for several years past has annually dressed at least 500 dolls, is this year prevented from renewing her work, which is the reason why the number of claimants for clothes left on hand at the present date is so much larger than usual. I think that among the hundreds of ladies who read Truth there must be many who will be willing to share among them the work that one lady has done single-handed for so many years, and I shall be happy to forward the dolls at once to any readers who will take them in hand.

King George intends to place a new Communion table in Crathie Church as a memorial of King Edward, who regularly attended the Sunday morning service there during his annual residence at Balmoral Castle, and his Majesty has just "approved" of the proposed design. The table is to be of Iona marble, with a richly carved oak screen behind it, surmounted by a canopy, the whole to be mounted on a base of Aberdeen granite. The oak carving is to be copied from the famous woodwork in the chapel of King's College, Aberdeen. This memorial will be unveiled and dedicated early next autumn on the first Sunday after the arrival of the Court at Balmoral Castle.

Meetings are being held all over the country to promote memorials to King Edward. In most cases schemes of a practically useful nature have been decided upon, instead of large sums being wasted upon a statue or a monument, which in a very few years becomes neglected, and is then a most melancholy object. It is to be regretted that at Bristol it has been resolved (apparently through the efforts of the Lord Mayor) to throw away some £10,000 on a statue, although the excellent medical charities of the city are in great and urgent need of assistance. It was announced at the Hampshire County meeting that "it is the wish of the King and Queen and the Royal Family that any memorial to King Edward should not take the form of a statue or monument, but that it should be something which might help to alleviate the heavier suffering of the poor." The Bristol people will do well to take note of this very praiseworthy wish of the King and Queen and Royal Family, and it is probable that subscriptions will be larger and more numerous if the memorial takes the form thus recommended.

An evening journal announced the other day with much parade that it learns on good authority that in the entourage of the Royal Family it is now generally accepted that the Coronation will take place in the week commencing June 18, probably on Wednesday, June 21. This news appeared in Truth more than three months ago, but without the ridiculous garnishings which it has lately received from both weekly and daily papers. As a matter of fact, the date of the Coronation was privately fixed in June, and shortly afterwards the Stewards of the Jockey Club were confidentially requested to alter the date of Ascot races, in order that the meeting might take place during the week before the ceremonial at Westminster. At the same time arrangements were made to postpone the show of the Royal Agricultural Society at Norwich until the last week in June, as for many years past it had always been held during the week after Ascot.

A great deal of exaggerated nonsense has been printed in various newspapers about Queen Alexandra's property at Buckingham Palace. The "immense collection of furniture, pictures, and art curios" does not exist. Everything at Buckingham Palace is Crown property, excepting only such articles in the private apartments of King Edward and Queen Alexandra as belonged to themselves. The bulk of Queen Alexandra's private property of this description has always been kept at Sandringham, and when King Edward died there was not much of it either at Buckingham Palace or at Windsor Castle. A great deal of the private property of this class belonging to King Edward and Queen Alexandra was removed from Marlborough House to Sandringham Hall about nine years ago.

Prince Francis of Teck was liked by all who knew him. He resembled his father in that his manner was easy and genial, while his talk was often both shrewd and droll. His personality was altogether attractive. It was his great misfortune that he had no chance of making a career for himself. He was in the Army for twelve years, and saw service in Egypt and in South Africa. A prince whose pecuniary means are limited is one of the most unfortunate of men, as he constantly finds himself in a painfully false position. He is indeed an earthen pot cast among a fleet of brazen vessels. At one time there was a project for Prince Francis to go into business in the City, but this met with so much opposition from some of his "exalted" relatives that it was abandoned. He had latterly interested himself warmly in charitable and philanthropic work, and will be gratefully remembered for his valuable exertions on behalf of the Middlesex Hospital. He was always most enthusiastic about any enterprise which he had in hand. Prince Francis spent all his life in England, but he was really a member of the Royal Family of Wurtemberg.

The Duchess of Albany arrived at Claremont Park on Thursday from Germany, accompanied by Princess Alexander of Teck. The Duchess and her daughter have been on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha at Reinhardsbrunn, their hunting seat in the Thuringian Forest. The Queen-Dowager of the Netherlands is to pay a short private visit to the Duchess of Albany at Claremont next month, before she settles at The Hague for the winter.

Princess Louise, who has been unwell since her "cure" at Harrogate, has left Kensington Palace to spend a few weeks at Roseneath Castle. The Roseneath shootings have been rented by Lord Inverclyde during the past season.

The King of Denmark is to leave Copenhagen shortly on his way to Vienna, and he will spend a few days with the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland at their country seat near Gmunden. King Frederick is going to Paris when he leaves Vienna, and he may possibly come to England afterwards for a week on a strictly private visit to their Majesties at Windsor Castle. Queen Louise is to stay at Copenhagen during the King's absence from Denmark.

The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Sweden and Prince Arthur of Connaught were last week on a visit to Lord and Lady Pembroke at Wilton House. The house at Wilton, which is of several periods, was begun during the reign of Elizabeth and finished by James Wyatt about a century ago, when it was considerably spoilt by being Gothicised; but many improvements have since been carried out. Holbein designed the Renaissance porch, which is now in the Italian garden. The house contains the Pembroke Marbles, a unique collection of ancient armour, and a splendid gallery of pictures, the portraits of Vandyck being especially fine, and there are some choice works of the Flemish and German schools. Sir Philip Sidney composed his "Arcadia" at Wilton.

The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Sweden have gone to Ireland, and they are staying this week on a visit to Lord and Lady Bessborough at Bessborough House, County Kildare.

Prince Christian arrived at Cumberland Lodge on Thursday from Berlin. H.R.H. had been abroad since the end of July, although during the last month some of the daily and weekly papers have repeatedly described him as "entertaining" at Cumberland Lodge and fulfilling public and private engagements at Windsor.

The Grand Duchess Sergius of Russia (née Princess Elizabeth of Hesse) has arrived at Darmstadt from Moscow, and during her stay in Germany she will visit the Emperor and Empress of Russia at Schloss Feldberg, and Princess Louis of Battenberg at the Château of Heiligenberg. It is expected that the Grand Duchess Elizabeth will proceed from Germany to Sweden, in order that she may pay a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Sudermania (Grand Duchess Marie Paulovna) at Stockholm.

The gushing accounts in some of the papers of the arrival of King Manuel and Queen Amélie at Wood Norton were exceedingly absurd. One reads of "the aged Comtesse de Paris" awaiting her relatives in the hall, and "tottering forward" when they entered the house. Next day "the aged Comtesse Paris" (who is sixty-two) had sufficiently recovered from her emotion to go out shooting, and she was so far removed from a "tottering" condition that she herself killed a fine stag in the park! The best thing the papers can now do is to leave King Manuel alone. It has never been the custom of this country to get up an elaborate fuss about exiled Royalties, and anything of the sort is highly objectionable on both public and private grounds.

It is not generally known that the late King-Consort of Portugal (Prince Ferdinand of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha) might have been King of the Hellenes in 1863, but he resolutely refused to become a candidate for the vacant throne. After the death of the Queen of Portugal the King-Dowager (as he was then described) formed a morganatic connection, and for the remainder of his life he led a luxurious and indolent existence, amusing himself by collecting pictures and rare books. He was always a very careful manager of his pecuniary affairs, and he left a large fortune to his morganatic family. The King-Dowager was a first cousin of Queen Victoria and Prince Albert, and he was the great-grandfather of King Manuel.

My Dublin correspondent writes:—

October has been largely devoted to the making of Irish history in other places besides Ireland. In the country itself the business has, as a natural consequence, been unusually brisk for the season. As the politics of to-day make the history of to-morrow, they intrude just now into everything that is done, or left undone. Their trail is over everything—and over everyone, it may be added, in private as in public life, inside "Society" as well as outside it. In fact there goes with Irish birth, accompanied by residence in Ireland, a necessary and an unavoidable entanglement in the intricacies of the Irish question, from which neither man, woman, nor child is exempt. Dublin Castle has been having an active time—Dublin Castle in villeggiatura, it might be said, for the Lord Lieutenant, the Chief Secretary and the Under-Secretary are all resident in their respective lodges in the Phœnix Park, and very near neighbours. Lord Aberdeen cannot be called pre-eminently a strong man—the strength of the administration does not lie in him. Mr. Birrell is predominantly humorous and "brainy," but credited with no particular fancy for holding office in Ireland.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen gave some small dinners during the week. On Thursday they went with a small Viceregal party to Belfast for the launch of the Olympic, and attended the luncheon party given by Lord and Lady Pirrie in honour of the occasion. Others who accepted Lord Pirrie's invitation were the Lord Chief Baron, Lord and Lady Dartrey, Lords Shaftesbury, Annesley, and Powerscourt.

The Chief Secretary's Lodge was the centre of much hospitality and sociability during the week. Amongst those who stayed there were the Master of Elibank, Mr. and Mrs. Percy Illingworth, Lady and Miss Lewis. The Chief Secretary and Mrs. Birrell entertained Lord and Lady Aberdeen at dinner on Tuesday, together with Miss Asquith and some members of the Viceregal staff. Other guests were Sir Neville and Lady Lyttelton, the Lord Chancellor and Lady Walker, and Mr. and Mrs. T. W. Russell. On Saturday afternoon Mrs. Birrell's "At Home" was largely attended and largely not attended as well, for the "Society" boycott includes the Chief Secretary's Lodge, as well as the Viceregal. The entertainment included charming recitations by the Irish actresses, Miss Sara Allgood and Miss Maire O'Neill. No pleasanter host and hostess than Mr. and Mrs. Birrell ever presided at the Chief Secretary's Lodge. The pity is that, in private life even, the happy spirit of agreeing to differ has so little place amongst us as regards politics.

The Duke of Abercorn came from Baronscourt to attend the meeting of Irish peers, which was held at Lord Iveagh's house in St. Stephen's Green, specially lent for the occasion. The peers, after the manner of those wise men concerned in the Conference, took counsel with one another and kept their own counsel. The many varieties of Irish peers make the consideration of their possible position in any change of the constitution of the House of Lords an important matter to them. There are peers who are Irish quâ man and British quâ peer. Others are altogether Irish, with full privileges as peers, and others again are peers, a certain number of whom can only sit in the House of Lords on being elected by their own body as representative peers. It is of the Irish peerage in general that Lecky writes: "The majority of Irish titles are historically connected with memories not of honour, but of shame."

The sporting world is busily engaged in preparation for the hunting season, which begins this week. Lord Fingall, M.F.H., holds the opening meet of the Meath hounds at Navan on Thursday. During the past week the Curragh races have drawn large attendances. Mr. Percy and Lady Annette La Touche's house party for the occasion included Lord Enniskillen. Lady Milbanke is staying with her father in Kildare. Lady McCalmont returned to her residence, Mount Juliet, Kilkenny, from a big game shooting expedition in Canada, which was attended with much sporting success. It is not only as regards matinée hats that women's modern developments are in the direction of big things.

Field-Marshal Lord Grenfell, Colonel of the First Life Guards, is to be the Gold Stick in Waiting on the King during November, replacing Field-Marshal Sir Evelyn Wood, Colonel of the Royal Horse Guards.

The King has approved of the appointment of Mr. Dayrell Crackenthorpe, late First Secretary of the Embassy at Vienna, to be First Secretary of the Embassy at Tokyo.

The Duke and Duchess of Devonshire are staying for a short time at Hardwick Hall, where they have been joined by Lord and Lady Lansdowne for a few days. The Duke and Duchess will return to Chatsworth on leaving Hardwick, and they are to entertain a large party there next month for Derby races on November 16, 17, and 18.

Large parties are to be entertained the week after next for the Liverpool Autumn races at Aintree by Lord and Lady Derby at Knowsley Park, and by Lord and Lady Sefton at Croxteth Hall.

The Duke and Duchess of Norfolk have left Kinharvie House, the late Lord Herries' place near Dumfries, after a stay of nearly two months. They are staying for a short time at Derwent Hall, the duke's shooting lodge in North Derbyshire, before returning to Arundel Castle for the winter.

The Speaker left Hutton John, his country residence near Penrith, last week for the season, and he is not expected to return to Westmoreland until next summer. Mr. Lowther will pass some time during the next fortnight with his father, Mr. William Lowther, at Campsey Ashe, Suffolk, where he is also to spend the Christmas recess.

Mr. Alfred Henry Huth, whose death was announced last week, was the second son of Henry Huth, the celebrated bibliophile, who devoted himself for many years to the collection of a splendid library of early printed books. He was advised for a long time by Mr. W. C. Hazlitt, who added many treasures to the collection. Mr. A. H. Huth shared his father's tastes, and he added largely to the library in the eighties. A privately printed catalogue of the Huth collection was principally his work, but it had been commenced in his father's time. He was a man of high literary and artistic culture. He wrote several books, the most important being his biography of Buckle, the historian. His father was senior partner in the firm of Frederick Huth and Co., which had been founded by his father about a century ago, and who made an immense fortune in business. Mr. A. H. Huth owned a considerable estate in South Wilts. The Huths originally came from Spain, and Henry Huth was always glad to purchase fine Spanish books. This is one of the rare and satisfactory examples of a magnificent library being retained by the collector's family instead of its being carted off to an auction-room directly the funeral has taken place.

The death of Mr. T. F. Hatfeild Harter, of Cranfield Court, has caused very sincere and widespread regret in Bedfordshire. Mr. Harter was a country gentleman of the best school. He had a keen sense of the responsibilities of his position, and devoted himself unsparingly to public work, serving on the County Council, of which he was one of the original members, and on every other local body where he could be useful. He was a Deputy-Lieutenant of Bedfordshire, Colonel of the Buckinghamshire Imperial Yeomanry, and a J.P. both of his own county and Bucks; and in the discharge of all his duties he earned the admiration and respect of all classes of his neighbours. As an enthusiastic sportsman he was equally popular. He was one of the most familiar figures in the Oakley Hunt, and he hunted frequently with most of the neighbouring packs. Mr. Harter died at the age of fifty-six, after a very short illness, and it is to be feared that his great activity may have done something to shorten his life.

Colonel ffarington, of Worden Hall, Lancashire, whose death was announced last week, was the head of one of the oldest families in England, as they have lived on their estate near Wigan for twenty-six generations in uninterrupted succession. Colonel ffarington, who took a prominent part in the public life of the district, was a partner in the well-known Wigan Bank until it was acquired by Parr's Bank. He was one of the most active pioneers of the Volunteer movement in Lancashire in 1859 and 1860.

I hear from Paris that the Turks can't come to terms with the French Government over the projected loan, and negotiations are to be transferred to Berlin, where no conditions will be exacted. Sir Ernest Cassel makes no secret of his chagrin at Sir Edward Grey's refusal to let him place the loan on the English market; but I doubt if the Stock Exchange will share his soreness. Entente or no entente, the less capital we send to Turkey the less the necessity for future interference in Turkish affairs.

Only the other day the Liverpool Town Council was complaining bitterly about the hardship of valuing the Corporation's estate imposed upon them by the Budget. Some of the councillors are now probably wishing that they had concealed their feelings, for attention has been called to a question which is likely to become a burning one at the forthcoming municipal elections. Next to the City of London, Liverpool is the largest municipal landowner in the United Kingdom. In 1888 the late Sir A. B. Forwood stated before a Select Committee of the House of Commons that on the falling in of the then existing leases fifty-three years later the ratepayers would possess a property worth £12,500,000. A year or so later the surveyor reported that the rents were assessed to the rates at £710,931 per annum. Since that time no particulars about the dimensions and value of the estate have been allowed to leak out to the public. All that is known is that the huge property only brings into the city exchequer about £100,000 yearly, and Liverpool ratepayers are wondering how it is that they only get this comparatively trivial amount out of their vast estate, and what becomes of the balance of £600,000.

The Liverpool Post, which has been investigating the matter, explains that the loss is probably due to the system of fines for a renewal of leases which was devised by the council in 1824 being still in force. Under this system leases are granted for seventy-five years, renewable on payment of a fine equal to sixteen years' purchase. But the system also allows of a renewal of the lease at any period of its currency at a reduced rate. Thus a renewal at the sixth year may be obtained for a fine of £12 per £100 annual value. How this works out is illustrated in the case of a bank which pays a rent of £3,350 a year. Renewing its lease every six years in seventy-five years, the payments with compound interest would amount to £16,439, whereas if the full term were allowed to run the Corporation would receive £53,000. This is good business for the leaseholders, but the ratepayers will hardly look upon it in the same light when once the facts are brought home to them.

I have received the following letter from Mr. Pickersgill with reference to the attack which he thought fit to make upon the Home Secretary, but quod scripsi, scripsi. I still think that Mr. Pickersgill was not justified in charging Mr. Churchill with failure to give due consideration to the case, and the distinction which Mr. Pickersgill draws between consideration given to the sentence and to the conviction itself is a distinction without a difference, since a consideration of the sentence must necessarily involve a consideration of all the circumstances of the conviction.

October 22, 1910.

Sir,—Your note in this week's Truth is so injurious to me that you must in ordinary fairness permit me to make a very short reply.

Your references to "charges brought by" me against Mr. Churchill's administration suggests that I had made a general attack. I did nothing of the kind. My letter was strictly limited to one case which I knew, and in regard to which I had a special locus, for the unfortunate victim was my constituent. Again you say, "Mr. Pickersgill was not justified in charging the Home Secretary with failure to give due consideration to the case, particularly when there was in his possession correspondence which clearly showed that such consideration had been given." That is not so. Kindly refer to my letter in the Daily News again. What you call the "gravamen" of my charge was contained in the following sentence: "The Home Secretary's reply suggests to me that my letter had not even been read with care, for the reply refers only to the sentence, whereas I had challenged the conviction itself." This observation applies quite as much to the later letter which I received from the Home Secretary as it does to the original one. Both were absolutely irrelevant to the case which I had put; and it is impossible to suppose that a mind so acute as the Home Secretary's would have failed to grasp my case if he had himself read my letter with care.—Yours truly, E. H. Pickersgill.

The first volume of Mr. Monypenny's eagerly expected "Life of Lord Beaconsfield" is to be published this week, and some inaccurate statements concerning Lord Beaconsfield's papers have appeared in the press. It has been stated that all these papers were left to Lord Rowton. As a matter of fact, the whole of Lord Beaconsfield's papers passed on his death into the hands of Lord Rothschild, one of the executors, and they remained in his custody until they were delivered to Mr. Monypenny for the purposes of this biography. Among these papers is a collection of sparkling letters written by Lord Beaconsfield to Mr. Brydges Willyams, of Torquay, who left him a large sum of money.

Certain remarks that were made in Truth the other day about the "Charles Dickens Testimonial" have naturally not commended themselves to the promoters of the movement, and I have had one or two letters of protest on the subject. It is pointed out that the object is merely to enable lovers of Dickens's works to testify their sentiments by a graceful presentation to his family; that while the intention is not "charitable" in any sense, several of the novelist's descendants are in a position which renders such a presentation appropriate; that the family do not feel affronted by the proposal, and so forth. Well, of course, different people look at movements of this kind with different eyes. Seeing the distinguished array of names on the committee, I am bound to admit that the movement has obtained approval in sufficient quantity and of sufficient quality to justify it; and I must withdraw the obnoxious phrase which attributed it to the initiative of some misguided busybody. With every respect for the wise and eminent persons who are assisting, I am afraid that I cannot bring myself to bless the undertaking, but I will refrain from cursing.

The Birkbeck Lectures on Ecclesiastical History at Cambridge are to be delivered during this term and the next by Mr. Coulton, of St. Catherine's. The subject is "Monasticism from St. Bernard to the Reformation." These lectures are awaited with much interest, as Mr. Coulton's published writings show that he is not a believer in the roseate view of monastic life which is now so popular.

The Archbishop of York is to preach in the University Church at Oxford on Sunday evening at the special service for undergraduates. The Bishop of London preached last Sunday, and the pulpit is to be filled on November 6 by Canon Carnegie, of Birmingham, and on the 13th by Canon Beeching.

The Master and Fellows of University College, Oxford, have presented the Rev. Thomas H. Davies, D.D., to the rectory of Headbourne Worthy, near Winchester, which is vacant through the preferment of Canon Storr, and of the net value of about £320 a year, with house. The parish is a very small one.

Canon Alexander is to be in residence at St. Paul's Cathedral during November, replacing Archdeacon Sinclair, and he will preach on Sunday afternoons throughout the month.

Lord Spencer has presented the Rev. H. J. L. Arnold, vicar of East Dereham, to the rectory of North Creake, Norfolk, vacant by the appointment of the Bishop of Thetford to a canonry in Norwich Cathedral. North Creake is one of the richest benefices in East Anglia, the net stipend being over £700 a year, with house, and the parish is not a large one. This living is in the alternate gift of Lord Spencer and the Bishop of Norwich. On the last vacancy the Crown (i.e., Mr. Balfour) presented, the patronage having lapsed for that turn in consequence of the promotion of the rector (Dr. Lloyd) to the see of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The living of East Dereham, thus to be vacated, is in the gift of the Lord Chancellor, and of the net value of about £450 a year, with house.

The Deanery of Wells has been placed at the disposal of Mr. Asquith by the resignation of Dr. Jex-Blake, who was appointed by Lord Salisbury in 1891, on the death of Dean Plumptre. The stipend is £1,000 a year, with a delightful old house and a beautiful garden. Dr. Jex-Blake possesses considerable private means, so he will not claim the retiring pension to which he is legally entitled. He was headmaster of Rugby from 1874 until 1887, and filled that post with great success. Earlier in life he had been an assistant master in the school in the early part of the Temple period, and afterwards headmaster of Cheltenham College. He held the rectorship of Alvechurch, Worcestershire, from 1887 until 1891, having been presented to that benefice by Bishop Philpott.

A correspondent suggests that among the clerical grievances that have lately been referred to in TRUTH should be mentioned those of the clergy who, holding neither benefices nor curacies, are yet able and willing to take duty when required. My correspondent's point is that this class of men are sometimes treated with very scant courtesy by bishops, in proof of which he mentions two cases. In the first a man who had been working in a certain diocese with the sanction of the bishop for several years received notice from the bishop on Christmas Day that he would not be allowed to officiate in the diocese again. Knowing no reason for this arbitrary interdict for certain, but having reason to suspect that he had been confused with another clergyman who had been guilty of gross misconduct, the man wrote to the bishop asking his reason for withdrawing his sanction. The bishop curtly replied that it was unnecessary that the correspondence should be prolonged. It could, of course, only be inferred from this that his lordship had some very serious reason for the course which he had taken, though it was equally certain that he had made a mistake; but the unfortunate man concerned had no remedy, and has had to remain under the unknown imputation thus laid upon him. The bishop's selection of Christmas Day of all days for his kindly and considerate action is an interesting incident in the story.

In another case a clergyman who had the sanction of two neighbouring bishops to officiate in their dioceses, applied to the Bishop of Southwell for like sanction in his diocese. The bishop thereupon requested the clergyman to meet him at Nottingham at 11 a.m. on a Monday morning. The clergyman happened to be officiating on the previous Sunday evening at a village church in another county many miles from a railway station, and consequently was unable to reach Nottingham by the time named. The result was that he never obtained the bishop's sanction. If these are fair samples of the way volunteers for duty are liable to be treated by bishops, it is not surprising that many clergymen who have private means are spending lives of idleness.

There is, I believe, a prejudice against this class of clergyman, and it may be that some of them are scarcely ornaments of the Church. A letter which appears in another column may possibly throw some light on one reason why some of them are in their present position. But I should say that the present system of patronage has more to do than anything else with the fact that so many men of means desert the ranks of the working clergy. The position of a curate is not one which can be congenial to any man when he is getting towards middle age, and if he finds himself without the influence necessary to obtain a living, it is natural enough that he should decline to work on as a curate all his life when he can manage to subsist without the curate's exiguous stipend.

I am the more disposed to believe that the above-mentioned examples of the attitude of bishops towards "unattached" clergymen are not unprecedented in view of an experience communicated by a gentleman who has taken duty for some years as a lay reader. This gentleman not many months ago accepted an engagement in a country village, and on his arrival found that the village was troubled with one of those ecclesiastical scandals which are too frequent. Among other things, the living had been sequestrated, although the rector had not informed him of this fact when engaging him. It was a condition of his engagement that he should enjoy the "hospitality" of the rectory. The conditions of the household, however, made life extremely unpleasant, and what was of more consequence, he was unable to obtain the small payment due to him.

Accordingly, the gentleman gave up the appointment, and in returning his lay reader's licence to the bishop explained his reasons in detail. He learned that the bishop had warned a groom not to enter the rector's service because he was not likely to be paid—that being the normal condition of the rector's servants and tradespeople—but his lordship did not think it necessary to give any hint of the condition of affairs to this gentleman before he went to assist in the parish, and when the latter wrote to explain his reasons for leaving, he merely received a formal acknowledgment of his letter from the bishop's secretary. Can anyone wonder that when the "reverend fathers" discharge their duties in this spirit Church scandals abound?

The Church of England Men's Society held a conference at Bristol last week, under the presidency of the Archbishop of York, which was very largely attended, but the practical results appear to be 000. There were the usual cut-and-dried discussions and resolutions concerning national purity, the marriage laws, and the Divorce Commission. Archbishop Tait or Archbishop Magee would have recognised the fatuity and the utter absurdity of memorials demanding the "abolition" of the Divorce Act of 1857. It was scarcely worth while to discuss a resolution in favour of a systematic study of religion and Church history, for every one must be of the opinion that such study is highly desirable. It might just as well be proposed to repeal the Catholic Emancipation Act. It is a pity that Archbishops and Bishops do not lead their followers into the path of practical common-sense, instead of being themselves led by flighty visionaries.

Apropos of the recent paragraphs in TRUTH on the advertisements in Life and Work, I have received the following from the representative of a well-known firm of advertising contractors, Mr. R. T. Lang, of Tudor Street, E.C.:—

I have read with a great deal of interest the remarks in your current issue regarding the acceptance and insertion by a Scottish religious periodical of advertisements of, to say the least, a questionable character.

As the head of a firm which handles a very large amount of advertising, I have invariably made it a rule that we will not touch advertisements of this character, although such have been frequently offered to us. I do not claim any particular morality in this, but I will put it on the lowest ground that I do not think it pays any firm with a reputation to be mixed up with such advertisements, and I have often wondered why it has not occurred to some of these religious newspapers (and I am sorry to say they are the worst offenders) that they are destroying their own property by accepting anything and everything that comes along.

By inserting advertisements of this character they destroy the advertising value of their media. It is a curious fact that we do scarcely any business with newspapers of this kind. On the other hand, we have a considerable and growing connection with that "wealthy newspaper which invites prosecutions as a means of subsistence"—i.e., TRUTH. My clients find that TRUTH, by keeping its advertising columns clean, gives better value.

Your critic endeavours to shield himself behind the plea that it is impossible to know what are fraudulent advertisements. But we who are in the business have never any doubt. Does the advertising manager of TRUTH not know what is a questionable advertisement and what is not? Does any man in the advertising profession not know the firms and the advertisers to which you refer?

I say without hesitation, and every firm of standing in the advertising world would bear me out in this, that newspapers which accept these questionable advertisements lower their tone and their value in the eyes of those of us who have to make a study of these matters, and they would be well advised to consider whether it would not be sound commercial policy to keep a watchful eye upon their advertisement columns.

Although the reference to TRUTH makes me blush, I strain a point to publish this letter, because it puts from the point of view of an expert in advertising what I have frequently said myself on this question. Newspapers which stuff their columns with more or less dishonest advertisements not only lay themselves out to injure their own readers, but damage all the honest advertisers who incautiously patronise them. Perhaps it is because they are deficient in worldly wisdom that the religious papers make so little attempt to keep their advertisement columns clean. Among the unco guid of Scotland, however, aptitude for business is by no means unknown, and something may be hoped in their case from Mr. Lang's argument that honesty is the best policy.

HOME RULE.

(Knowledge of the skilful and intelligent management of the home is among the first needs of women. Mrs. Greenwood Bidder.)

In a leafy haunt of Flora
There's a little hut I know,
Where the ivy clings and clusters round the wall,
And a little wife called Nora,
Pure and spotless like the snow,
And she's quite the little Empress of it all.

She is every bit as pretty
As the "angel" down in Devon
Who nas recently been sung by Mr. Noyes,
In a captivating ditty,
Chiefly marked by words like "heaven,"
And I'm writing in the metre he employs.

In the cocking line she's skilful,
And she keeps the "cottage" trim,
With the help of little colleens nice and neat;
She is also rather wilful—
You should see her manage them,
For upon my soul I tell you it's a treat.

What could help one liking Nora,
As her eyes are all aglow
With the light her humble husband deems divine?
Yet it's awful to adore a
Little lady, do you know,
If she's such a high Aurora
Borealis, while below
You are forced to bow before a Sort of goddess——I could go
Rhyming on, but it would bore a
Lot of readers, see? and so
I must say I'm glad the lady isn't mine!

With reference to my comments last week upon the one-sided agreement which probationers are asked to sign upon joining the nursing staff of the Western Infirmary of Glasgow, a correspondent informs me that the document does not form a binding agreement, and that a decision to this effect was given in the Outer House of Session by Lord Stormonth Darling in June, 1901. This information should be of interest to nurses, who are deterred from refusing to submit to the petty tyranny of the place by the belief that they may be called upon to refund the wages they have received if they leave.

A good many readers of TRUTH have sent to me during the last week or two, with more or less unfavourable remarks, the latest appeal which they have received from Miss Weston. It is an appeal for "Christmas presents for sailors, their wives and children," the wives and children being particularly pointed to in requests for such articles as work-baskets, shawls, babies' clothing, frocks, socks, toys, etc. The objections that have already been expressed to Miss Weston's appeals on behalf of the men in the Fleet seem to apply specially to this particular appeal. Why should the public be asked to provide Christmas presents for the families of any class of men who are in regular work and fairly well paid, and many of whom strongly object to being advertised as suitable objects for public charity?

---

Sir William Treloar has sent me his annual appeal on behalf of the Little Cripples' Christmas Hamper and Clothing Fund with which his name is honourably identified. It is a practical piece of charitable work, and donations to the fund, which may be addressed to Sir William Treloar, 69, Ludgate Hill, E.C., will be well bestowed.

I have received £1 from Orion towards the Tress Barry Fund. I have also to acknowledge the following contributions to the Toy Fund:—Major Parry, £1; O. S. H., £1 1s.; A. W., £2 2s.; Orion, £2; Singapore, 10s. 6d.; S. T., £2 2s.

THOS. GOODE & CO.—Exhibition of old and modern WEDGWOOD, including many specimens never previously exhibited.—South Audley Street, London.

It was announced in Truth several weeks ago that Major-General Cowans would succeed Sir William Mackinnon as Director-General of the Territorial Force at the War Office at the end of this month. This post is worth £1,500 a year. Major-General Cowans has been employed in India for some years, and recently he has been in command of the troops at Calcutta. He had seen much service at headquarters before he went to India. It is understood that the appointment has been made on the recommendation of Lord Kitchener, who had opportunities of watching Major-General Cowans' work in India.

Major Corry will to-morrow replace Lieutenant-Colonel Cavendish in the command of the 2nd Battalion Grenadier Guards. He has hitherto been attached to the 3rd Battalion. Colonel Cavendish is going on half-pay. The Lieutenant-Colonel in command is one of the Field Officers in Brigade Waiting on the King.

The Army Council have made a hopeless mess of the cavalry reliefs. In order to carry out the so-called "linked system," which works all right for the infantry, but is inapplicable to our small force of cavalry, the 7th Hussars have to go back to India for a fourteen years' tour of service in 1911, when they only got home from Egypt in 1905. By the time they return to England in 1925 they will have done thirty years' foreign service against nine years' home service. At least four other cavalry regiments ought to go to India before them. There is no getting behind these facts, and no one can be surprised at the feeling which has been aroused by the injustice done to a large body of officers and men who are made to suffer for red tape bungling.

Mr. Haldane admits the injustice, but says it cannot be removed without "breaking up our whole system of cavalry organisation." All I can say is that if "our system" leads to a mess of this kind the sooner it is broken up the better. But as a matter of fact the cavalry division of the Expeditionary Force does not depend on this or that particular regiment, but would go on as it does now if the linked system were abolished and the foreign roster maintained. This is a matter which requires the attention of Parliament, in the interest not only of the regiment immediately concerned, but all others.

"You have solved so many hard problems in your time that I should think this is not beyond your power," wrote Sir Charles McLaren to Mr. Haldane last June. The problem is not beyond Mr. Haldane's power if only he will throw over his military advisers, who have, as usual, placed him in a hole from which he can't get out except by surrender. All this trouble is a further proof of the inefficiency of the Army Council as at present constituted to govern the Army. Injustice like that against which the 7th Hussars have been kicking would never occur if those who make the regulations were in proper touch with those who have to obey them.

The 7th Hussars could have no better champion than their full Colonel, Sir Hugh McCalmont—the faithful henchman of Lord Wolseley through every one of his campaigns. At all times a cheery companion, McCalmont's Irish humour showed to best advantage in depressing situations when his chief's spirits often fell below par. On this account "Baby McCalmont" was an immense favourite with Wolseley, whose high opinion of him as a cavalry officer was fully confirmed when he sent him across the Sudan desert from Korti to Gubat at the head of the light Camel Regiment. Lord Wolseley being out of favour at the time of the Boer War, McCalmont was not allowed to go to South Africa, and he retired from the army in disgust; but at the age of sixty-five he is still the beau idéal of a light cavalry leader, and has all Sir John French's qualities, with some others which that General does not possess.

A Service correspondent writes:—

The career of the regimental officer is so dependent on the result of examinations that it is desirable that information should be obtained as to how they are conducted. The Civil Service Commission do not appoint examiners until they are thoroughly tested as to their abilities both in framing questions and marking them. Is any procedure of the same nature carried out at the War Office? In answer to a question put not long ago in Parliament the Secretary for War refused to give a return of the officers now employed. The prevalent suspicion that jobbery is rampant at the War Office is not likely to be lessened by such a refusal. In the days of the military Education Department in Pall Mall the so-called "crammers" could fairly estimate how their pupils would pass in any competitive examination. It would be interesting to know what their views now are.

I hear on very good authority that the post of Commander-in-Chief at Devonport will be offered to Prince Louis of Battenberg. Admiral Sir Wilmot Fawkes will not have completed his full term in this billet until April next, but he has been in indifferent health for some time past, and will probably retire earlier. There are very few berths which will be eligible for an officer of such seniority as Prince Louis for a long while to come. Most of the high flag commands are now held by admirals of quite recent appointment.

Rear-Admiral Bush has been selected to succeed Vice-Admiral Egerton in the command of the Cape of Good Hope Squadron. Admiral Bush, who was specially promoted from the Royal yacht, wears the Order of the Osmanieh, fourth class, in recognition of his distinguished services at the battle of Tokar.

As a schoolboy I was persuaded that "chameleon" is the correct way to spell the name of the fickle-coloured lizard. The Admiralty, however, in applying the name to one of the latest destroyers, prefer to make it Cameleon. To their many sins "My lords" have now added the dropping of h's.

The Committee to inquire into the organisation of the Royal Corps of Naval Constructors is well chosen on the whole, although perhaps the Admiralty element is just a little too prominent. There is a good leaven of representation from the great private shipbuilding yards. I understand that it is practically certain the Committee will recommend a considerable relaxation of the technical restrictions by which Admiralty designers are beset. The reproach that the private contractors of the kingdom, who build for foreign powers unfettered in design, get better value for displacement than the Admiralty constructors is undoubtedly true. The Brazilian Minas Geraes, of 19,281 tons, designed and built at Elswick, is generally admitted to be a much more formidable fighting machine than our Collingwood, of the same size. But it is only fair to add that the Admiralty designers are handicapped by having to work to rule of thumb.

The present scratch system of drafting a submarine man from the parent ship every time one of these units leaves harbour is not regarded as satisfactory. I understand that for the future submarines are to be formally commissioned, like other vessels. This means that the same set of officers and men will always work together in the same boat. There can be no doubt that this will be a change for the better. In fact, seeing the obvious importance that officers and crew should have an intimate knowledge of all the little "tricks" of a submarine, and be used to working together, the wonder is that the existing plan, under which men are vaguely appointed "for service in submarines," should have continued in force so long.

The undisguised preference which is shown for Maltese messmen in the British Navy has often been referred to in Truth. There may possibly be justification for it in the case of ships in the Mediterranean, but there is no reason why it should extend further. The other day H.M.S. Commonwealth, now in dry-dock at Devonport, needed a messman, and the fact was duly advertised in the local Press. There are at present plenty of qualified British messmen employed in the port, and there were numerous applications for the berth. Among the candidates came a Maltese apprentice (the Maltese messmen are allowed to have apprentices for instruction on board H.M. ships). Th youth was so dirty that he was ordered ashore to clean himself. He did this so successfully that when he exhibited himself in his true colours he was selected in preference to all the British candidates. If this is not giving an "unfair preference" I do not understand the meaning of that term. In private life if a servant came after a place in a filthy, dirty condition an ordinary master or mistress would not overlook that fact because it is possible to wash the dirt off.

At last the Admiralty "have had under consideration" the question of inflicting naval penalties upon a man who has already been punished for an offence by the civil authorities. Certain modifications in the King's Regulations are the result. The general tendency of them is in the direction of partial stoppages of pay and deprivation of good conduct badges, in graduated degree according to the Service record of the offender. The absurdity—to say nothing of the iniquity—of punishing a man for desertion because his intention of returning to his ship has been frustrated by an unwise use of stimulants will now be got rid of.

A naval correspondent writes:—

A few years ago, at Portsmouth, a destroyer was told off to experiment against the boom defences. These were elaborately rigged; the engines of the little craft set running at full speed, and spectators held their breath in anticipation of stove bows and an exit. Instead of this the destroyer jumped the boom as easily as she would have lifted to a billow. The result, all naval men were agreed, was to demonstrate that the protective value of boom defences against torpedo attack is nil. Yet with laborious punctuality are these cumbrous obstructions still rigged at the principal naval ports. Hulks are moored in position, and water traffic held up for many hours. Probably the men engaged in this work are as well employed as they would be in ninety-nine other duties of harbour routine. But what ought to be considered is the inconvenience caused by the dislocation of traffic, and the danger of inducing confidence in a method of harbour defence which was proved worthless, at our expense, by the Dutch nearly two and a half centuries ago.

One or two communications have reached me in reference to some alleged extensive frauds on His Majesty's Customs at Belfast. The allegation is that owing to an ingenious use of several pounds of lead in the process of weighing tobacco for duty every turn of the scale has meant a loss to the revenue, and it is estimated that these losses, which are said to have been going on for something like two years, amount in the aggregate to tens of thousands of pounds. A detailed description of the method by which the revenue was cheated and its discovery by the Collector of Customs appeared in the Liverpool Daily Post about three weeks ago, but up to the present time the names of the parties concerned have not been disclosed, nor has there been any public statement as to the action the Board of Customs has taken or proposes to take. In view of the seriousness of the matter it certainly ought not to be quietly hushed up.

LINES TO AN OLD FRIEND.

(By an Impecunious Doctor.)

When life is getting humdrum
  And maladies are few
I try to beat my dumb drum
  And blare a stave to you,
For quacks are quick and stealthy,
And people far too healthy,
But you shall make me wealthy,
  O friendly little Flu!

Come not, O kindly savage,
  Into each patient's head
With unrelenting ravage,
  But come with softer tread,
And (broadly speaking) what'll
Require a med'cine bottle;
Incarnadine each throttle,
  And send them all to bed.

But come not all too easy,
  Lest everyone you've got Wonders (if merely sneezy)
  Whether it's you or not.
You think it doesn't matter
If I'm not feeling fatter,
O silly little hatter,
  Of course it does, a lot!

And, microbe, you will please me
  If you (ay! there's the rub)
Will promise not to seize me
  In this forced quest for grub,
O try me not with treason,
Nor bring your opening sneeze on
In this my salad season:
  Codfound it all, you've cub!

A lottery circular from a Hamburg tout named Paul Goldmark was delivered to the addressee a few days ago in an envelope labelled by the Post Office: "Found open and officially sealed." It was evidently one of a batch of circulars posted by an emissary of Goldmark's at Coventry to save the difference between the foreign and inland postage. The transmission of lottery circulars through the post is illegal, and the Post Office recognises this to the extent of co-operating with the police to secure the detection and punishment of persons posting such circulars. From this incident it would seem, however, that once the circulars are got into the post officialdom shuts its eye—like the law, it is, I suppose, only one-eyed—to the illegality, and carefully fastens up and delivers duly sealed the contents of any envelopes that come open.

The agitation by the unemployed teachers seems at last to be making some impression upon the stolid Moderate majority of the London County Council. Last week the Council unanimously passed a resolution urging the Board of Education to see that no further addition be made to the number of unqualified teachers, and instructed the Education Committee to report as to classes containing more than sixty pupils and the requirements of the Board of Education in regard to these classes. This is all very well, and may provide some of the present out-of-work teachers with jobs, but if the agitation is not to become a chronic complaint the sooner the Council sets to work to provide something more than a temporary remedy the better. For a party with a burning desire to save the ratepayers' money the Moderates seem strangely loth to cease manufacturing unwanted teachers at the ratepayers' expense.

There is a revival at Portsmouth of the ridiculous agitation for the "promotion" of the borough to the rank of a city. Portsmouth, it is said, should take its place among the great cities of the kingdom, but dubbing it a city will not make it one of the great cities, nor would it be one penny the better off for the change of name. Probably it would be a good many pennies worse off, for the idea seems to be that if Portsmouth is converted into a city it will be able to boast of a Lord Mayor, and Lord Mayors, I take it, are more expensive dignitaries to maintain than plain Mayors.

The need for enlightenment of Irish Guardians on the undesirability of keeping children in their workhouses, to which reference was made in TRUTH recently, was illustrated at a meeting of the Visiting Committee of the Cork Board last week. The Local Government Board inspector who attended suggested that thirty children now in the workhouse who had been deserted by their parents should be boarded out in some distant union. The chairman of the board, as an argument against adopting the suggestion, urged that he found that children who had grown up in the workhouse regarded it as their home, and even their children regarded it in a similar light. No doubt he intended the argument as a tribute to the happy home life of the Cork Workhouse, but it sounds much more like a recognition of its success as a pauperising institution.

The suggestion made in TRUTH of the desirability of a public inquiry into the St. George's-in-the-East Guardians scandal has been backed up by the Stepney Council of Public Welfare, who have sent a resolution to the same effect to the Local Government Board. Meanwhile the guardians have held a special meeting to consider the situation, at which one of the Local Government Board's inspectors attended. I am glad to find that my further suggestion that this should be done has borne fruit.

It has fallen to Mr. Justice Grantham to appoint a new Clerk of Arraigns for the North-Eastern Circuit, in the place of Mr. Robert Holtz, of York, who has resigned that office. The new clerk is Mr. C. M. Barber, who was called to the Bar only about two years ago. He sat as associate for a few days during the last assizes at Leeds. The post is worth £400 a year.

It is well to put on record certain remarks made by Mr. Justice Scrutton in sentencing Mr. F. E. Swann, solicitor, which I find in the Daily Mail, but not in the other reports:—

> The judge described as most reprehensible and regrettable the practice on the part of solicitors of mixing their clients' money with their own accounts. The system was a dangerous one, and ought to be abandoned by every respectable solicitor.

It seems almost incredible that the Incorporated Law Society—or at any rate the majority of its members—should refuse to make a professional rule against a practice which one of his Majesty's judges declares "ought to be abandoned by every respectable solicitor." Yet this is what the Society has refused to do, and solicitors are merely officers of the Court whose judges speak in these terms!

Apart from judicial dicta, it is even more amazing that the governing body of the profession should refuse to stir a finger to abate the perennial scandal brought on the profession by these ever-recurring convictions of solicitors. On behalf of Mr. Swann it was pleaded that he had been led from the path of virtue by his partner, Bradley, who had committed suicide. Be that as it may, Messrs. Swann and Bradley had between them misappropriated £20,000 belonging to an estate in trust. The facts sufficiently show how much confidence is still placed in solicitors, and the result shows how utterly misplaced it is. Swann has now gone to penal servitude for five years. It would be most instructive to know how many of his professional colleagues he will join in gaol.

Lord Macfarlane, the new judge in the Court of Session, is to be succeeded as Sheriff of Fife and Kinross by Mr. T. B. Morison, K.C., who has been one of the Advocates-Depute for nearly five years. The office is worth £800 a year, and it is usually a stepping-stone to higher promotion. Mr. Morison is the son of a well-known solicitor to the Supreme Court at Edinburgh, and he received his early legal training in his father's office. He has been a member of the Faculty of Advocates for nearly twenty years, and in 1899 he was called to the English Bar. He is a very able lawyer, and has enjoyed a large and very excellent practice. He is a Liberal, and at the general election he unsuccessfully contested West Perthshire against Lord Tullibardine. The appointment has met with general approval in the Parliament House.

That millions of people should have been intensely absorbed for weeks in the squalid horrors of the Crippen case is enough to make a superior person weep. But as long as human nature remains what it is, stories such as this, whether true or imaginary, will continue to fascinate the majority of mankind. In point of fact no thrilling history of crime that has ever been enacted on the stage or related in a novel approaches in its appeal to human interest the story of this man Crippen's life from February 1, when his wife was last seen alive, to October 22, when the Lord Chief Justice sentenced him to death; and thousands of people to whom the details of the story were utterly sickening have been unable to resist the fascination of following it step by step to the end.

So far as I can remember, the case is in one respect unprecedented in the annals of our criminal courts. Not only was the evidence connecting the prisoner with his wife's death entirely circumstantial, but there was nothing but circumstantial evidence to prove that any murder had been committed, or indeed that the woman is dead at the present moment. The piecing together of the scraps of evidence which went to prove that Mrs. Crippen was dead, and that her husband murdered her, presented a most fascinating intellectual problem, apart from the dramatic, or melodramatic, elements of the case.

It will be interesting to see whether any disinterested person will have the courage to come forward and suggest that Crippen has been wrongfully convicted. I suppose no one who has properly digested the evidence can have any more doubt on this point than the jury had. But there remains an element of mystery which only Crippen can clear up for us. How and when did he dispose of the rest of the poor woman's anatomy? Why did he conceal the tell-tale fragment in his house when so much more had been successfully got rid of? After completing the greater portion of his work so successfully, why did he leave as evidence against him portions of his own and the woman's clothing, strands of her hair, and the curling-pin? I suppose I am not the only person who would give something to read the missing chapters of the story. It is a trite reflection that murderers always give themselves away by doing some stupid and unaccountable thing. As a matter of fact, this is not true, because a great many murderers escape detection altogether. Crippen is not a likely man to have put on record evidence against himself without some reason. No cooler-headed criminal has ever stood in the dock. Through the whole drama his self-possession never deserted him, except when he yielded to the temptation to make a bolt for safety, and thereby fastened the noose round his own neck.

Nemesis has been a long time overtaking Edward Shuckburgh, the Bristol moneylender, but he has at last got his deserts. At the Somerset Quarter Sessions last week he was charged with obtaining £150 from an elderly widow without disclosing the fact that he was an undischarged bankrupt. It was a particularly gross and heartless robbery, for the sum in question was the whole of the victim's savings. Shuckburgh induced her to realise a safe investment and hand over the money to him for reinvestment on mortgage, and when she did so he appropriated it to his own purposes. The nine months' imprisonment to which he was sentenced is all too little punishment for such a rascal.

On August 17 I commented on the action of the St. Ives magistrates in committing for trial a man named Bertram Webb on a charge of attempted suicide when he had been manifestly suffering from an epileptic seizure. The justice of my remarks was vindicated at his trial at Huntingdon last week, the jury acquitting him without calling upon him for his defence. Under these circumstances it is scandalous that Webb should have been kept in gaol three months merely through the stupidity of the police and magistrates, who were too thick-headed to realise that medical and not penal treatment was what he required.

As a rule there is no need to complain of the Great Unpaid belittling their own dignity, but a correspondent gives me an account of an incident which shows that even this may happen occasionally. Two young men had been charged the other day at a Dorsetshire court with some trifling offence and acquitted. After the court had risen one of the magistrates approached the defendants and informed them that it was owing to his influence that they had been let off. However, the chairman of the bench happened to overhear the claim, and promptly informed them that their acquittal was in no sense owing to any special influence of any one magistrate.

The following instance of judicial leniency is sent me by a country draper, who thinks that it is hardly likely to conduce to careful discrimination by employees between their own and their employer's property. He caught one of his female assistants in the act of purloining some of his goods, and a search of her lodgings afterwards revealed the fact that she had appropriated his stock to the value of £152. He prosecuted, and the magistrates committed the young woman to the Herefordshire Quarter Sessions, where she pleaded guilty. For the defence a medical man was called, who stated that she had been delicate as a child and likely to grow up weak-minded, and another gentleman of position averred that he had always thought she was rather "soft," the result being that the Chairman bound her over in the sum of £50 to come up for judgment if called upon.

As she had been in the draper's employ for five and a-half years, and had shown no signs of weak-mindedness, he was naturally astonished at the result. He was under the impression that the "softness" from which she suffered was a disease for which the law relating to larceny was expressly framed to provide the remedy, especially as at the same sessions two poor men, who broke into a house and helped themselves to £5 worth of goods, received eight and twelve months' imprisonment respectively. I am not going to say that the Chairman was wrong in his treatment of the case, but it does illustrate the danger of forgetting that the law is devised for the protection of the public by making the future welfare of the prisoner the first consideration in the imposition of a sentence.

The Dolgelly justices got themselves into a pretty tangle last week. They were hearing a case in which a farmer was charged with having a "snatch" in his possession with the intention of taking salmon. The prosecution proved that the instrument was a gaff, and the solicitor for the defence claimed a dismissal of the case on the technical point. The Bench retired to consider the point, and on their return announced that they had decided to convict the defendant, regardless of the fact that the defence had not been put before them. Thereupon the solicitor refused to proceed with the defence, and after a second retirement the justices adjourned the case for a fortnight for reconsideration. Really, it was too bad for a smart solicitor to make laughing stocks of the poor simple magistrates.

"Mr. Maude in Form" was the heading under which the Yorkshire Herald one day last week chronicled a series of sentences imposed by the magistrate at the West Riding Police Court at Leeds. It was a remarkable list, amongst the cases being a sentence of a month's imprisonment on a man who had asked for food at a house, and had shown the necessity which prompted him to beg by sitting down on the next doorstep to consume it, while three months' hard labour rewarded another man for singing in the street. In another case Mr. Maude censured the Wrexham magistrates for issuing a pedlar's licence to a man who had once been convicted of begging. Anything which would tend to rob him of the pleasure of sending a beggar to gaol he evidently looks upon as a personal grievance.

One of the worse instances of what is known as the "screw" meat trade I have ever heard of came before the Wolverhampton county magistrates last week. The defendant, a butcher named Owen, was caught in a shed reeking with filth and decomposing flesh dressing four quarters of tuberculous beef for consumption. He was fined the substantial penalty of £26 and costs, but really no fine is adequate punishment for such an offence. In all 400 lbs. of beef were found, sufficient to have supplied 130 families, and a purveyor of disease on this wholesale scale richly deserves a stiff term of imprisonment.

Bung has some staunch friends on the Warrington Bench. A publican pleaded guilty last week to selling beer during prohibited hours, whereupon the magistrates, after retiring to discuss the case, announced that it would be dismissed on payment of costs. The decision was not allowed to pass unchallenged. Two of the justices quitted their seats on the Bench after publicly protesting against it. It is comforting to think that there are magistrates who prefer the approval of their consciences to the benediction of "the trade."

Royal Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.—6,550 convictions last year. Complaints marked "Private" absolutely confidential.—Secretary, 105, Jermyn Street, London.

My prophecy that the formation of Farkasch's multitudinous teeth shops into limited liability companies would turn out to be a dodge for evading liabilities has received further confirmation. An action was tried at Bishop Auckland last week in which a former employee of the Bishop Auckland Hygienic Institute, Limited, sued the company for the sum of £14 15s. illegally detained by them. One of the terms of his engagement was that he should allow a sum of money to be kept back as security for the satisfactory discharge of his duties, and when he left payment of the money was refused. He obtained judgment for the amount, but the possibility of obtaining the cash seems remote, since on putting in an execution for costs in a previous action, when the company failed to obtain an injunction against him, he was met by claims to the company's furniture by the local manager, a furniture dealer, and by debenture-holders. It will be interesting to Farkasch's employees to know that they are just as likely to be victimised as the customers for Farkasch's teeth.

One of the most seductive items in the advertisements of the Magic Footdraft Company, of Bangor House, Shoe Lane, London, E.C., is the promise that if the "Footdrafts" fail to cure the money paid for them will be returned. The promise takes the form of a "guarantee" contained in a booklet issued by the company, and it is insisted upon in the follow-up letters sent to persons who apply for samples of the goods in the following words:—

> You must remember this is no experiment with us. . . . We give you an absolute binding guarantee, so that you run no risk, for every penny will be paid back if the Drafts fail to cure.

In the case of a working woman who was thus induced to send the company 22s. in the hope of getting rid of her rheumatism but has received no relief two applications for the return of the money have remained unanswered. People often ask my opinion of the value of "guarantees" like this given with quack remedies. This incident may help them to judge for themselves.

That such promises are enforceable, however, in the county court was shown in the recent case referred to in TRUTH in which judgment for £10 was obtained against the consumption quack, C. H. Stevens, of the Broadway, Wimbledon, by the widow of a man whom he had failed to cure. Stevens has since by counsel made an application for a new trial to Judge Gye at Basingstoke County Court, on the ground that the promise to give £10 to any one whom the nostrum failed to cure was not advertised until after the deceased man had commenced the treatment. His Honour refused the application on the ground that no substantial injustice had been done, and, in fact, Stevens had advertised that he would give £5 on the same terms previously to the man commencing taking his stuff. Leave to appeal was also refused, his Honour remarking that he did not think Stevens entitled to any indulgence whatever.

From what a member of a big city firm told me the other day I gather that the collectors for the numerous shady charities whose names are mostly to be found in TRUTH Cautionary List have now returned to town, and are devoting special attention to the City of London. My friend called at TRUTH Office to know whether I had any reason to revise my opinion in regard to the Metropolitan and Provincial Association for Befriending Poor Children. I knew of none, and even if I had known of any, the fact that he had elicited from the collector an admission that she received as remuneration 50 per cent. of the amount she collected would be quite sufficient reason for advising people to patronise less expensively managed charities.

Amongst other recent visitors the same gentleman also numbered that perennial old humbug the Rev. Robert Macmillan, and collectors on behalf of Breton's Poor Children's Society, and the Mariners' Mission. From the last of these he learned that the founder of the mission, Enos Couch, is dead. With his passing to the place reserved for defunct charity-mongers, wherever it may be, another of the links which connect TRUTH with the charitable exposures of the last generation is severed. It was in 1866 that Enos Couch founded the Mariners' Mission, and in the earliest numbers of TRUTH his claims to be considered a philanthropist were made sufficiently clear to prevent him doing much mischief. He never abandoned his parasitic industry, however, and when last I heard of his mission he had transferred it to West Kensington, a district where missionary labour among mariners was hardly likely to be of an arduous description. I shall be interested to learn who has succeeded to the reversion of the business.

The editor of a provincial newspaper sends me the following letter which has been sent to him for publication, but, wiser than some of his contemporaries, he sent it to me instead of publishing it in his columns:—

"MISFORTUNE'S ANGRY MIEN."

> Sir,—Would any generously disposed reader of the "Journal" care to help a man who—formerly in an excellent social and commercial position—has been ruined by a sentence of five years' penal servitude, recently completed at Dartmoor?
> I am the man.
> I have now no friends, no home, no means; and, bitterest blow of all, my dear wife died in great sorrow just before my release.
> I am a very capable secretary, accountant, manager, and organiser, and in my days of prosperity was a liberal succourer of many in distress, although in this the hour of my deep abasement no one I have formerly known will help me. They pass me by in the street instead.
> I have the offer of the sole agency of an old established house in France, worth in time £2,000 a year, but cannot provide the requisite guarantor.
> If any one will assist me in restoring my fortunes, which have been laid low by a dire and grievous calamity, it will mean the total restoration of a life.—Your faithful servant,
> October 5, 1910. NIL DESPERANDUM.

---

The writer of this epistle is a Mr. E. Vivian Warde, and his career is not one which would lead anybody who knew the details of it to act as a guarantor for him in any position of trust. The dire and grievous calamity of which he speaks was only one of a series similarly dire and grievous, dating back to 1875. Some twenty years later, on the completion of one of his sentences, the late Mr. George Herring gave him a helping hand, and he repaid his benefactor by fraudulently misappropriating funds belonging to a club in which Mr. Herring was interested. For this offence he received another five years' penal servitude. It is evident that no sympathy need be wasted upon him.

C

The reference in Truth last week to Mrs. Rossiter's begging appeals has brought me a letter from that lady, in which she disclaims any reference during the past year and a-half to a clergyman's daughter. She is right in this instance, for by a slip of the pen I wrote daughter instead of niece. The point is immaterial, however, for the objections to her appeal for the niece are precisely the same as if it had been for the daughter. In another letter to a gentleman who wrote to Mrs. Rossiter calling her attention to my comments, she replied that she had informed me that her appeal was open to an accountant's investigation. What she did tell me some time ago was that she had decided to give up the pseudo-philanthropic part of her business, and it is a pity that she has not seen fit to keep her promise.

Until a few days ago I had not heard of the death of the poet Lumsden, of Edinburgh. He used to receive occasional notices in these columns in consequence of his habit of posting volumes of his verses to strangers, with a request for a remittance of 6s. or the return of the book. The deceased bard apparently left some stock-in-trade, which his widow is now getting rid of in the same way. She says that, as she is going to Queensland in March next, she is very anxious to sell out. There is no objection to her selling out, but she ought to know that this dumping of the goods on people who have not ordered them is not a legitimate way of doing it.

A remarkable instance of the ease with which women are induced to part with hard cash in the hope of getting on the stage was related to me by a victim the other day. She had come to London from the provinces, where she had had some local successes as an entertainer, in the hope of obtaining the hall mark of a metropolitan success. She naturally found great difficulty in obtaining a hearing, and in the course of her efforts she was introduced to an "Operatic, Musical Comedy, Dramatic, and Variety Agent," named Richard Brandon, of 15, Challoner Mansions, West Kensington. This gentleman gave her a hearing, and professed himself delighted with her ability, but he explained that what she needed was an original sketch and careful coaching in it if she was really to make a success. This he told her he could himself supply.

Accordingly an agreement was drawn up by which Brandon, in return for the payment of £15, undertook to supply a monologue to represent five or six characters to be played by one person, to give her tuition for three months at one lesson per week, and at the end of the time to give her a "trial show." The lady paid the £15, and in due course received the MS. of the duologue. It is now in my possession, and a schoolboy who wrote such precious twaddle would deserve to be well birched. The sketch is supposed to represent a typist and the visitors who come to her office on business. This is the sort of stuff of which it consists:—

Enter young woman, 'Arriet type.

What cher! my old sport? I want yer to type a letter to my Bill. Yus, me an' Bill 'ad a up-an'-downer at the Leg-o'-Mutton last night, and I told him I'd never speak to him again. Eh! Oh, of course, I didn't mean it. I didn't get a wink o' sleep last night. What do I want to say? Well, just say, "Bill, come back, I'm sorry. Forgive me. Yours, Sal." Half a dollar. Good for yer! Cheap! (Exit.)

Altogether there are just two pages of foolscap in the MS. of which this is a sample, and for such puerile twaddle and tuition in it Brandon has had the audacity to ask £15. Of the value of the tuition I have no means of judging, though it is pretty obvious that no amount of tuition would ever make such nonsense result in anything but ridicule for the entertainer who presented it in public. As for the other item in the agreement, "the trial show," this took place before an unnamed gentleman—represented as the manager of a music hall—who was profuse in his expressions of admiration, but has made no offer of any engagement. I have not heard of Mr. Brandon before, but I am glad to make his acquaintance and to give aspirants to dramatic fame a hint as to the value of his agency.

The following advertisement is an interesting sign of the times. It shows what the woman movement has brought us to, when ladies, in addition to all their other troubles in getting servants, have to consider what their politics are:—

COOK and HOUSE-PARLOURMAID.—Wanted, TWO USEFUL HELPS as COOK and HOUSE-PARLOURMAID. Both must be capable workers, early risers, fond of animals, and Conservatives. Mrs. — .

THOUGHTS OF A MIDDLE-AGED BACHELOR.

Season of fading leaves and windy skies,
Thine is the rightful moment, is it not,
For men of middle age to moralise
A lot?

When I myself look back on days gone by
And muse upon the habits of my prime,
I'm bound to own I had a downright high
Old time.

I was not then a wicked fellow; no!
O'er me no moody parent mourned or raved;
It was not wine that made folks call me so Depraved.

A fell disease had laid its hold on me,
I was a veritable turtle dove,
Destined, by hook or crook, always to be
In love.

The fatal thing about it, so to speak,
Was the bald fact one girl would never do;
I used to love a different one each week
Or two.

Beneath a hundred girlish smiles I'd bask,
Sunning myself in Cupid's heavenly spa,
But none of them could ever make me ask
Papa.

Time passed without my meeting with my "Fate,"
And love soon dwindled to a settled sham,
Leaving me here the simple celibate
I am.

No; don't imagine I am sick of life,
Although I may be crusty, glum, and quaint;
Nor that I'm hoping now to win a wife:
I ain't!

SCRUTATOR.

IS IT A DEAL?

THE political situation, which has undergone so many kaleidoscopic changes during the last twelve months, has given signs in the last two or three weeks of another transformation. It is an open secret—the one secret of the Constitutional Conference that has leaked out—that the eternal question of Ireland has obtruded itself into the deliberations of the Eight Front-benchers, as it obtrudes itself into every phase of domestic politics. On the top of this come many indications that something big and dramatic is "in the air"—the astonishing declaration of Mr. Redmond that his party have ceased to regard "Home Rule all round" as a subtle device for extinguishing all the hopes of Ireland; the equally astonishing utterances of the Observer, intimating that Unionists must be prepared to offer up some of their cherished convictions (including those which relate to Ireland) as a sacrifice to the Empire; and finally the letters of "Pacificus" in the Times—particularly that of Saturday, suggesting that wise and patriotic men would welcome a pronouncement from the conference—following historical precedents—that it believes the true road to the settlement it has in view would be the constitution of a further conference, with a mandate to consider wider constitutional problems, including that of the relations of Great Britain and Ireland. This remarkable suggestion the Times itself commends to the consideration of the Unionist Party and the nation. These utterances have very much the air of being designed to prepare the ground for something to follow; and the quidnuncs have naturally no difficulty in announcing that the Eight are already drafting a report in the sense suggested by "Pacificus."

Being one of the few journalists who have not enjoyed the privilege of knowing all that has taken place in the conference chamber, I am unable to state how far the current prognostications are accurate. All I can say is that if the great caucus should shape in the way desired by "Pacificus" I shall be among the wise and patriotic who will welcome the result. Long before circumstances brought the Eight together, it was suggested in these columns that constitutional questions about which the country is very much divided ought, if possible, to be adjusted by accommodation between parties. There must be some sort of general agreement about the form of government under which we all have to live, and this implies compromise. Other burning questions may be settled by the chances of the ballot box, but even then only because there has been a previous agreement to accept this mode of settlement. The constitution of a government means among other things the provision of a method for determining all matters of difference between various sections and parties. It follows that there must be a definite and general agreement in the first instance about the form of government. All experience shows that without such agreement there can be no finality in constitutional changes. A section or party temporarily holding the necessary power may force such changes upon its opponents, but the latter will never accept them permanently; an attempt to restore the status quo ante invariably follows. I always think in this connection of Charles the First's head. It was cut off without any attempt at resistance; ten years of republican government followed, equally without resistance; and then the pendulum suddenly swung full-length in the opposite direction, and the Monarchy was in a moment as firmly re-established as though no king's head had ever been cut off. Still, there was no finality. Reaction followed reaction as long as each side insisted on having its own way when it got the upper hand, until in the course of sixty years or so a system of constitutional government was hammered out—a compromise which all parties virtually accepted. If a Constitutional Conference had been assembled in 1649 to discover some middle course of reform on which the warring factions could agree, the nation might have arrived there and then at very much the same conclusion to which it eventually drifted after the most uncomfortable seventy years of its history. We are not likely to have civil wars, chopping off of heads, military revolutions, changes of dynasty, and such-like alarums and excursions over the reform of the House of Lords or the modification of the Act of Union. But otherwise the argument is the same in the case of the twentieth as in that of the seventeenth century. There can be no permanent settlement of questions involving fundamental constitutional changes except by the consent of all parties, based upon mutual concessions and compromise.

When the Government went into the conference on the House of Lords' question there was much resentment among the more bellicose spirits in the Liberal ranks, and very naturally. The party had a majority, of sorts, and, considered from the mere point of view of party advantage, a fight to a finish on the House of Lords' question was clearly the winning game. For this reason the conference involved more sacrifice to the Liberals than the Unionists, though, of course, any compromise that might result from the conference must imply equal sacrifice on each side. If it should come to a question of renewing the conference with a wider commission, the Unionists will be chiefly concerned. As Liberals have acquiesced, with as good a grace as they can command, to seeing the House of Lords' question removed from the arena of party warfare to that of negotiation between the Front Benches, there seems no reason why they should not agree to the Home Rule question being treated in the same way, always provided the Irish party (or parties) are agreeable. On the contrary, Home Rule having always been a stumbling block and a cause of offence, and a good many Liberals being the reverse of enthusiastic about it, there seems every reason why all sections of the party should rejoice at any opportunity of getting it permanently disposed of. To Unionists the matter must present itself rather differently. Opposition to Home Rule is the raison d'être of the party in its present shape; the very name of the party must pass away if Home Rule be at last conceded to Ireland. It is one thing to invite a political party to make some surrender of its principles on patriotic grounds; another to ask it to give up the very ground on which it has stood for twenty-five years, and to make a fresh start in life with a new creed under a new name. To the ardent Tariff Reformer, who has a new name and a new platform ready for immediate use, this may seem a small matter; but there are still a good many of the party who are Unionists first and Tariff Reformers afterwards, or not at all. Liberals should remember this if what is now talked about ever comes to pass, for in negotiating over a compromise you must remember and weigh what the other side is giving up as well as what you concede yourself.

When it comes to "Home Rule all round," still more the creation of a Federal Constitution for the whole Empire, there will be cross currents again on the Liberal side. Home Rule for the three kingdoms was sedulously preached on the Liberal side a few years ago, but it never "caught on"—largely from a feeling that we had already bitten off more Home Rule than we could chew, and also because there was no "effective demand" from the interested nationalities. Lately there has been a perceptible development of local Home Rule feeling in Wales, and it seems to be growing in Scotland. There is obviously a great deal to be said in favour of "devolution" to local legislatures of some portion of the work which staggers legislators at Westminster, and no reason why either Liberals or Conservatives should oppose such a measure. As for Imperial Federation, I personally have no faith in it, and a good many Liberals have always shared this scepticism. Such a reform appears to me either superfluous or mischievous. If I were a colonial I should resist it with all my might; at the same time, it seems to me that the Colonies have more to lose by it than we have. Mr. Garvin seems to hold out this priceless boon to his party as an inducement to them to waive their prejudices against Home Rule for Ireland. They are thus, in Mr. Chamberlain's historic phrase, to "make a sacrifice for the Empire." Speaking for myself I can only say that if the Unionists are prepared to make this sacrifice, no matter from what motive, and if the Colonies, who are most concerned, are really willing to come into a Federal Constitution, I would waive a good many prejudices on the subject of the constitution of the House of Lords and Imperial Federation, as a sacrifice to the great end of getting the Irish question and the House of Lords question finally settled by a general agreement.

This end seems to me too much to hope for. But looking at the situation all round from the various points of view indicated above, it clearly presents the possibility of a great political "deal." Where that is the case it cannot be beyond the wit of man to bring the deal off. Two things are pre-eminently necessary—the right temper and the right brokers to conduct the negotiations. We really seem to be in the right temper—the coming of a Coronation having a good deal to do with it—and it should not be impossible to find honest and competent brokers.

PRESS PECKSNIFFS AND THE CHARING CROSS BANK.

Was there ever a more nauseous exhibition of canting hypocrisy than that given by the press on the occasion of the failure of the Charing Cross Bank? For years this concern has imposed upon the confidence of the public chiefly by means of a liberal expenditure on newspaper advertisements. In scores of London and provincial journals, including not a few that are regarded as of the highest standing, the bank's advertisement was a standing feature, the source of a steady income to the publishers. Last week the bubble burst, the advertisements disappeared, and forthwith the columns of these same journals were filled with harrowing stories of ruined depositors and edifying reflections upon the folly and greed they displayed in succumbing to the temptation held out to them by the Charing Cross Bank. Just look at these choice extracts from some of my contemporaries:—

> The failure of this institution has not affected the City, which was barely aware of its existence, . . . but the terms offered were sure to attract numbers of ignorant and thoughtless people.—Times.
> This institution advertised far and wide, . . . and induced a large number of thrifty but ill-informed people to increase the income from their savings by taking a preposterous rate of interest and running risks against which they might have been warned by any intelligent office boy.—Daily News.
> Numberless warnings have been given in these columns against those institutions which have sprung up in recent years and by the promise of high rates of interest have induced the public to leave the path of safety . . . minor soi disant banking institutions, very often working on unsound lines, which attract the poorer class of investors by specious advertisements.—Pall Mall Gazette.
> It adds point to the warnings frequently given here against banking with any but the great banks of recognised standing. To entrust money with the minor institutions called banks which offer high rates of interest is not banking, but speculation.—Daily Mail.

More eloquent than any comment I can make upon these articles is the bald fact that every one of the newspapers named gave publicity to the advertisement of the Charing Cross Bank down to the very day of the bankruptcy of its proprietor, Mr. Alfred William Carpenter. From the lofty pedestal of a financial expert in Copthall Avenue the City editor of the Times looks down upon the ignorant and thoughtless dupes of the bank and complacently assures them that it was an institution of whose existence the City was barely aware. Yes; but how in the world could the ignorant and thoughtless readers of the Times be expected to realise this when they saw the advertisement of this concern appearing in that paper day after day under the heading of "Banks"? How, too, could the thrifty but ill-informed patrons of the Daily News be supposed to know that its columns were being used to inveigle them into running risks against which the intelligent office boy of the Daily News could have warned them, had he been consulted? Both the Pall Mall Gazette and the Daily Mail refer with evident self-satisfaction to the warnings they have given against minor soi-disant banking institutions. No doubt general warnings have been given whenever an institution of this class—e.g., Feltham's Bank and the Atlas Bank—has come to grief. That very fact, however, rendered the continued publication of the Charing Cross advertisement all the more mischievous and reprehensible, for innocent readers would naturally assume that it would not be allowed to appear if the bank was one of those against which the editorial warning was directed. Of course, the City editors of these and the rest of the well-known daily papers which are in the same boat—I have only mentioned four, but there were many others—were not directly responsible for this conflict between precept and practice. I dare say they would have suppressed Mr. Carpenter's advertisement if they had had power to do so, and I do not, therefore, wish to blame them personally for what has happened. Speaking of their papers impersonally, however, I must say that the attitude they have taken up in this affair of the Charing Cross Bank is audaciously Pecksniffian.

I think I have some excuse for writing strongly on this subject. Nearly four years ago the searchlight of Truth was turned on the Charing Cross Bank, and during a period of ten months I published article after article in which I gave what I deemed to be good reasons for regarding as inevitable the disaster which has now occurred. Eventually, in November, 1907, Mr. Carpenter commenced an action for libel against Truth—an action which is still technically sub judice. I at once put in a plea of justification, and for three years my legal advisers and the plaintiff's have been engaged in a protracted series of preliminary fights over points which had to be settled before the case could be tried. Chief among these points was the question whether I was entitled to inspect certain of the plaintiff's books, and on that question—one, by the way, of great importance, not only in this particular case, but in many in which newspapers are sued for libel—I appealed from the Court of Appeal to the House of Lords, which gave judgment in my favour in June last. The plaintiff's books would accordingly have been examined by accountants on my behalf almost immediately if he had not filed his petition in bankruptcy. It is hardly necessary to say that this prolonged litigation has been very costly to Truth. I do not complain of that, nor do I suggest that my wealthy contemporaries were called upon to take the course I adopted in what I conceived to be the interests of the public. But now that the crash which I predicted has happened I do think I am fairly entitled to point out that while Truth has been incurring this heavy expenditure, scores of newspapers, from the Times downwards, have been drawing a substantial yearly revenue from the Charing Cross Bank. The Times, the Mail, and the rest of them may say that it was not their duty to prejudge the action against me by refusing to accept Mr. Carpenter's advertisements. That plea has been heard before under similar circumstances. The curious thing about it is that it never, or hardly ever, occurs to the papers to give their readers the benefit of the doubt by rejecting the advertisements till the matter is cleared up. With the honourable exception of the Manchester Guardian—a journal whose standard of conduct in these matters puts to shame most of the London dailies—I know of no newspaper which declined to insert the Charing Cross announcements after the publication of the TRUTH articles. The case is not one in which my contemporaries can say that they were unaware of my criticisms of the bank. If they do not read TRUTH, they must be assumed to have seen the reports of the interlocutory proceedings in the courts in which the drift of the articles has been revealed. It is not for newspapers to plead ignorance of contemporary events which newspapers have reported. Besides, if no word in reference to the bank had ever appeared in TRUTH, it was still manifestly a concern likely to prove a snare and a delusion to the "ignorant and thoughtless" (Times) and "the thrifty but ill-informed" (Daily News). It was known that the so-called bank was merely a trading name of one individual; that no audited balance-sheet had ever been issued (with the exception of an essentially bogus document withdrawn by Carpenter in 1895, in consequence of a threat of legal proceedings under circumstances narrated in my articles); that the statement of the alleged assets, liabilities, and surplus in the advertisements had been repeated year after year without the alteration of a single figure; and that the statement in the prospectus, "registered under the Bank Charter Act," was a gross misrepresentation. There is, in short, no excuse for the part the press has played in bringing about this financial catastrophe.

How great a catastrophe it is has not, I fear, yet been fully realised. For the last four or five years Mr. Carpenter has been systematically extending the sphere of his operations by opening branch after branch in all parts of the United Kingdom. It is no secret that these branches did very little business apart from the collection of deposits from people beguiled by the offer of abnormally high rates of interest, and ignorant of the fact that they were not dealing with a bank at all in the legitimate sense of the word, but merely lending money to one Carpenter. It will be some time before full and exact information can be available, but meanwhile the debtor's own estimate of the liabilities of the bank at £2,500,000 is probably near the mark. As to the assets, not even an approximate estimate can yet be given, but it is at any rate certain that there will be an enormous deficiency, and probably it will not fall very far short of £2,000,000. The majority of the depositors are doubtless people in comparatively humble circumstances whose life's savings have been entrusted to this precious bank, but there are others whose deposits run into thousands of pounds. Some of the newspapers, notably the Daily Mail, have been instrumental in securing the formation of a depositors' protection committee, which will look after their interests in the bankruptcy proceedings. It is the best they can do for their victimised readers, and though I am happy to think that my own readers have been saved from the meshes of the Charing Cross Bank, I recommend any depositors who may read these lines to communicate with the committee. Obviously the organisation of the depositors will cost money, and money will be required, too, for the relief of many who were rendered destitute through this failure. No doubt all the newspapers, headed by the Times, which have regularly published the Charing Cross Bank advertisements, will make appeals for the relief fund. May I venture the suggestion that these newspapers should hand over to the fund a proportion—I suppose it would be too much to ask them for the whole—of the sums they have received from Mr. Carpenter, during, say, the last four years, for the publication of the specious advertisements with which he entrapped their ignorant and thoughtless readers? If I remember rightly Carpenter's expenditure on advertising at the time of my inquiries in 1907 was believed to be something like £200 a week. Since then it has been largely increased, and I do not think I shall be guilty of any exaggeration if I estimate his payments to the press at not less than £60,000 in the last four years—not to go back any further. By the contribution of even a tithe of this as conscience money the Press would give the relief fund a good start.

THE HUDSON'S BAY AND PACIFIC MYSTERY.

The article which appeared in TRUTH on October 12 dealing with the present position of the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Company and the attitude of the Canadian Government to this undertaking has resulted in my receiving the following letter from the Canadian Government's Office in this country:—

17, Victoria Street, London, S.W., October 19, 1910.

SIR,—The High Commissioner's attention has been drawn to an article published in TRUTH of the 12th instant under the heading of "The Hudson's Bay and Pacific Mystery."

There are two important misstatements in your article which I am to point out. You state that:—

> 1. In view of the statement in the charter that, upon the due proportion of the capital being subscribed, and the construction of the railway commenced within the period provided by the Act, the bonds would be guaranteed by the Canadian Government, it would on the face of it seem that the enterprise must receive official sanction.

There is no such provision—nor, indeed, any provision—for a guarantee of the bonds by the Dominion Government.

You further state:—

> 2. That the attitude of the Government ought to have been declared publicly in Canada before any money was obtained from the public, instead of being left to be extracted piecemeal from the Canadian authorities in London by the Editor of TRUTH.

As your columns show, there is no justification for such a statement, and every proper opportunity has been taken to inform the public as to the actual position, and on August 5, 1910, a public warning was issued, and published throughout the United Kingdom, by Lord Strathcona, upon the authority of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, dealing plainly with the matter, in the following terms:—

> On several occasions during the past few months the attention of Lord Strathcona has been directed to misstatements which appear to have been made by, or on behalf of, the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Company and the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company.
> Upon the authority of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Lord Strathcona desires to say that there is no warrant for the statement contained in a prospectus issued by the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company claiming that the bonds which, under its charter, the railway company is authorised to issue are to be guaranteed as to principal and interest by the Canadian Government. For this statement there is not the slightest foundation in fact. It is an absolute fabrication, as the Canadian Government has not given any such guarantee, and the public should be guided accordingly.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,
> W. N. GRIFFITH.

I am the more pleased to give this letter full publicity because it enables the public to judge decisively what amount of credence can be placed upon the statements made by Mr. Greville, the managing director of the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company, Limited, that his company has received assurances that the railway company's bonds will be guaranteed by the Canadian Government. Mr. Greville was so explicit in his declaration to my representative that I must confess that I was for a time in doubt as to the true position of affairs. Not having the text of the charter before me, I read into the clause authorising under certain conditions the issue of bonds a condition which was non-existent. In the reply to the letter which I addressed to Lord Strathcona putting the facts as I understood them, that error remained uncorrected, and my comments on the attitude of the Canadian Government were therefore made under an easily understood misapprehension.

As regards the second point in my article, to which the High Commissioner takes exception, I wish it to be clearly understood that neither now nor in my past comments has it been my intention to make any reflection upon the attitude of the representatives of the Canadian Government in this country. It is my own experience, I doubt not that it is the experience of the public generally, that in no public office is there less red tape or more readiness to take trouble in assisting the public than at the office of the High Commissioner for Canada, and I should much regret if any remarks of mine have conveyed any other impression. It certainly appeared to me desirable that the Canadian Government should have publicly defined its attitude towards Mr. Greville's undertaking at an earlier stage than the enterprise has now reached. But in the light of the facts of which I have now been placed in possession it would seem that the Canadian Government took steps to repudiate the mis-statements made so soon as they were brought to its notice. Statements made on behalf of a company which is working underground, so to speak—securing its capital from private sources, instead of appealing for funds by a published prospectus—are difficult both to get hold of and to check.

In this instance the statements made for the purpose of getting rid of shares of the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company have been promptly repudiated by the managing director of that company directly they have been brought under his notice as "unauthorised." It was not until I got into personal communication with Mr. Greville that I obtained any definite particulars as to the position of the company's affairs. From him I learned that a considerable sum of money had been already invested in the undertaking, stock books opened, and construction work commenced, and he assured me also that he and his representative had been promised personally by Sir Wilfrid Laurier that at the proper time a Government guarantee for the railway company's bonds would be forthcoming. That statement has been categorically denied by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In order to make assurance double sure I have, since the receipt of the letter published above, communicated again with Mr. Greville on the subject. He adheres to his statements. But the official repudiation is not the only reason why I cannot accept Mr. Greville's version of what passed at that interview. He informs me that the promise had been made to him at an interview he had with Sir Wilfrid Laurier in October, 1908. At this interview he was accompanied by Mr. Sinclair, a Canadian barrister at that time representing the company's interests. On this point I have placed myself in communication with Lord Strathcona, who from official correspondence in his possession has enabled me to arrive definitely at the true facts of the case. Amongst that correspondence is a letter from Mr. Sinclair to Sir Wilfrid Laurier reciting the reasons Sir Wilfrid had given at the interview why a Government guarantee of a bond issue would be refused, and making further propositions in support of a renewal of the application. That letter is dated December 4, 1908. To it a reply was sent on December 14, 1908, over Sir Wilfrid Laurier's own signature, stating that the further proposals made could not be entertained. It will be seen, therefore, that so far back as December, 1908, Mr. Greville must have been fully aware that the Canadian Government refused to guarantee the bonds of the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Company, and on each subsequent occasion when the Canadian Government has been asked whether the decision then arrived at has been altered, an equally emphatic negative has been given, the last time being in reply to my own inquiry on the matter. It appears, therefore, that Mr. Greville must have known from the first that there is no prospect of any such guarantee ever being obtained.

The importance of this matter to those who have been induced to put money into the undertaking is obvious. The probability of the railway ever being constructed depends upon the bonds being guaranteed, and the profits of the Development Company, to say nothing of the security for its capital, are dependent upon the railway being constructed. If people have invested money upon Mr. Greville's assurance that the guarantee will be forthcoming, it seems to me that they are depending on a broken reed, and that Mr. Greville will have some serious questions to answer in the near future. In this respect, I must say that up to the present the managing director of the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company treats the matter as if he is on perfectly safe ground. In his last interview with my representative he declared that he had been approached by the head of a big firm of railway contractors who has recently been touring Canada in the company of Sir Wilfrid Laurier with a view to tendering for the construction of the railway, and that the contract is now in the hands of solicitors awaiting completion. He further informed me that in the course of a week or two he would be in a position to furnish me with full details of the contract, and he expressed himself satisfied that in spite of all denials the guarantee of the bond issue would be forthcoming before Christmas. As to this, I think we must adopt for the present the historical maxim, "Wait and see."

KENNEL CLUB PERSECUTION.

The high and mighty dignitaries of the doggy world who form the committee of the Kennel Club are determined that their travesty of justice in the case of Mrs. Ashton Cross shall not be forgotten. The matter cropped up again at a special general meeting of the Pekin Palace Dog Association held on the 21st inst. at the Ritz Hotel under the presidency of Lady Algernon Gordon Lennox. The meeting had been rendered necessary by the refusal of the Kennel Club to grant a licence to the Pekin Palace Dog Association to hold a winter show on the ground that Mrs. Ashton Cross is a member of the association. Lady Algernon, after expressing the opinion that the Kennel Club had erred in dealing with Mrs. Ashton Cross's case, said that she and other members of the executive committee of the association had diligently searched the Kennel Club rules, but could find no reference to such a requirement as the expulsion of a member suspended by the Kennel Club from an affiliated club or association, and as chairman she protested emphatically against the Pekin Association, which has strictly adhered to every published rule of the Kennel Club, being placed on the same level as a club which had withheld prize money or otherwise defrauded the public.

Her ladyship's indignation will be shared by all who have taken the trouble to acquaint themselves with the facts of the case. Here we have a body of persons who have in all the proceedings which have hitherto taken place made a claim for consideration on the ground that they have only exercised their judicial functions with studied fairness. Yet this "judicial" body has set itself to hound down a lady against whom it has issued one of its decrees and to penalise an association which refuses to adopt and carry into effect its sentence of ostracism; and in considering this action on the part of the Kennel Club it must be borne in mind that the offence with which Mrs. Ashton Cross was charged was merely that of breaking Kennel Club rules. Yet these sticklers for the letter of the law do not hesitate to act without the authority of the rules, which are as binding upon them as upon any mere member of the club, in order to enforce their boycott upon a lady whom the highest legal authorities and some of the most respected members of their own club consider to have been unjustly condemned by them. It is not surprising under these circumstances that the Pekin Palace Dog Association refused to make itself a catspaw of the Kennel Club by deciding to hold no show of its own during the period of Mrs. Ashton Cross's suspension. It was the only decision at which any fair-minded body of ladies and gentlemen could possibly arrive. Of course, it is quite possible that if Mrs. Ashton Cross had been content to accept the dictum of the Kennel Club bigwigs with befitting humility the present position might never have arisen. But she had the audacity to question the rightness of the decision, and for that offence, apparently, she is to be persecuted just so long, I presume, as she remains in contumaciam. In fact, the Kennel Club arrogates to itself powers usually associated with the Papacy, and solemnly pronounces a decree of excommunication against her. But not only is she herself to be cut off from all association with the kennel world; even her membership of a club or association is held to be such a contamination as to place such club or association entirely outside the pale, on the same level as the fraudulent concern which deliberately victimises the public. It is an extraordinary attitude that these Popes of the kennel have adopted, and I cannot think that it is one which will be approved by the members whom they are supposed to represent.

THE CHARM OF THE COUNTRY COUSIN.

All town dwellers have an attitude of kindly superiority towards the country cousin. They feel quite tolerant towards her, perhaps because she usually comes to town just when they are away, but they are distinctly aware of her mental and sartorial inferiority. Looking upon her strange garments, they find it impossible to believe that she has ever heard of Bernard Shaw or Rumpelmeyer's or Worth, or any other of our characteristic institutions, and probably suppose that if invited to dine at the Carlton she would turn up in a white blouse and a black skirt.

An odd thing about the country cousin is that one never meets her in the country. This is because in her native place she has the right background, and also is not suffering sartorially from that odd belief of the majority of Englishwomen that any old clothes do to travel in. But apart from her dull red skirt and rather sulphury cream blouse, and her hat with too much trimming on it, and the motor veil in which she walks down Bond Street, and all those small things by which she proclaims herself country cousin, such as being afraid to cross the road, and asking policemen her way, and so forth—apart from all these things which town dwellers find so amusing, and sometimes so irritating, the country cousin has a very great charm of her own.

Take her in London, for instance, that city of perennial fascination, which is, however, never young. She brings to it a cool stream of freshness, which it never gets at any other time of year. She is interested in everything. If she sees a hat in a window, or a skewbald horse, or a taxi painted bright green instead of dark red, or an omnibus going somewhere that no omnibus went when she was up last year, or a new sort of water-cart—whatever it is, the country cousin hails it with a delighted and unforced "Oh, look here!" In fact, she does not see it, she discovers it. She is a perpetually recurring Columbus. She is as energetic in publishing her discoveries as a tape machine; she is as indefatigable in making them as a child in asking questions. She enormously diminishes the sum of the commonplace in life, and increases its romance and its drama. London is to her a kind of Ferdinand, to whom she is Miranda.

She has a special brand of fatigue of her own. Nobody else ever gets quite so tired, nor tired in that particular way, until they go and sight-see themselves. Then they know the secret of the country cousin's curious droop in the back, and why she has the habit of leaning on an unrolled umbrella at street corners while waiting for her 'bus. But the deadly backache that comes of looking at pictures (Heaven knows why), the deadly eye-strain which results from the study of shop-windows, the sensation that the most comfortable old shoes are too small, and made of hot asbestos, after an hour or so of pavements—these things, which would wreck a man's enjoyment, cannot abate the country cousin's attitude towards the things around her. Her voice may drag, and her face be strained and tired, but when the bright green taxi or the illuminated advertisement that wasn't there last year, or the 'bus that isn't going anywhere that she wants to go, but never went at all before—when any of these things come into her line of vision, the country cousin is ready with her "Oh, look here!"

I was once standing waiting for an omnibus at Piccadilly Circus, when two ladies came round the corner from Regent Street. One of them was metropolitan from the top of her hat to the very pointed toe of her patent leather shoe. The other was equally obviously fresh and untamed from the country. They both walked with the shuffling limp born of extreme fatigue. Suddenly the country mouse cried, "'Oh, look here!" and dashed to the shop-window, and the town mouse, taking a few steps further on until she was well out of earshot amid the crowd, said in loud, desperate, furious tones, "Oh, come along!" Then, having relieved herself a little, she went politely after her guest. In that moment one realised what the progress down Regent Street had been, and one realised also that the undoubted charm of the country cousin, the freshness, the perennial interest that she brings, her unfailing fount of wonder and excitement—all these things are good for the town, but that perhaps it is just as well that they come into it when it is empty. We are not used to being interested ourselves; it is not in our code, and we find it fatiguing; and besides, country cousins always know so much more about our sights than we do, and they carry books of dates to historical places, and know the names of third sons of mediæval kings, who married princesses from small European kingdoms, and never did anything else. On the whole, one may say that the country cousin is a good influence for the town, and a delightful person—in the country.

THE STANDARD OIL TRUST.

WHAT IT IS, AND WHAT IT DOES.

THERE has lately arisen at Queen Anne's Gate, on the site of a fine Victorian mansion demolished to make room for it, a gigantic palace, steel-framed in the up-to-date style, clad in Portland stone, towering seven stories high above the neighbouring buildings, including the Office of Truth, looking down upon Buckingham Palace on the one side of the park, and standing on pretty nearly equal terms with the Government Offices and the Houses of Parliament on the other. The arrival of this imposing neighbour having naturally excited my curiosity, I was interested to learn that it has been erected for the accommodation of the Anglo-American Oil Company, which is the English branch of the famous Standard Oil Trust of the United States. Inquiring further, I found people who suggested that the view of the action of the United States Government against the Standard Oil Trust, still pending in the American Courts, and the possible return to office of Mr. Roosevelt with his "trust-busting" aspirations, it may possibly be in contemplation to transfer the headquarters of the petroleum empire from the present offices of the Standard Oil Trust in Broadway, New York, to Queen Anne's Gate, Westminster—as Constantine transferred the capital of the Cæsars from Rome to Byzantium, so these seers picture Mr. John D. Rockefeller removing his seat of government eastward from New York to London.

Time alone can test the value of this prophecy. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. The new Aladdin's Palace that has sprung up in Birdcage Walk is an eloquent manifestation of the growing wealth and influence of the Standard Oil Trust in this country. That is a cogent reason why the public throughout the United Kingdom should understand without loss of time what this Trust is, and what reason there is for men to be afraid of it. Little definite knowledge on this subject exists among us to-day. Echoes reach us of the iniquities charged against Mr. Rockefeller and his colleagues in America, they circulate vaguely about the country but make little impression. On the other hand, strenuous efforts to convey a contrary impression have been made with considerable skill. The Trust includes in its scientific organisation an efficient press department, and fights with the pen as well as with other weapons. I have therefore made it my business to undertake an exhaustive investigation of the history of the Trust and its operations, not in America alone, but in Europe and Asia. There is no great secret about the subject. But the materials are scattered and difficult of access. A good deal of new light has also been thrown upon the history of the concern, and its ramifications in the United Kingdom and other countries in the course of the great action of the United States Government against the Trust in the State of Missouri, referred to a moment ago. All these materials will be collected in the following articles, I hope for the benefit of the British public, and at the same time for their entertainment. In the Standard Oil Trust we have exhibited the highest perfection yet achieved by a ring of capitalists in the art of exploiting a great industry. The machinery that has been created for this purpose is a masterpiece of human ingenuity. The methods by which it has been employed seem to express the last word in craft, subtlety, and unscrupulousness, as employed for the purpose of amassing wealth. The Trust is consequently quite a fascinating subject for inquiry and reflection, apart from the direct interest which we every one of us have in its operations.

Summary of the Case.

The indictment against the Standard, put briefly, is that its founder, Mr. John D. Rockefeller, organised in 1870 a combination of American oil refiners, who controlled about 10 per cent. of the refining business, and that he secured from the U.S. railroads secret rebates on the carriage of their oil, and even larger rebates on oil carried for their competitors. The result was that it became the interest of the railroads to discourage the shipments of oil by refiners outside the Trust. Armed with this weapon of the secret rebate, the Standard Oil Trust was able to undersell its competitors and to force them to sell out at heavy loss. In ten years it had obtained by those methods the control of 90 per cent. of the American oil refining business, and being almost the sole buyer, it was able to dictate prices to the oil producers at the wells. It has since maintained its monopoly by elaborate espionage of its competitors' business, by running ostensibly "independent" oil companies to take advantage of the anti-Trust feeling, and by obtaining up to the present day unfair railway discriminations in place of the secret rebate. It maintains an expensive staff of lobbyists at the Legislative Chambers of many lands, and it has constantly adopted the methods of bribery (direct and indirect) in dealing with politicians and publicists. It has always aimed, not at fair business competition, but at absolute monopoly. So long as the production of kerosene (or illuminating oil) was the principal product obtained from crude petroleum it was able by its costly tank installations all over Europe and America to prevent other oil producers reaching the consumer except at a ruinous price; but the centre of gravity in the oil world has now shifted to benzine (or petrol), and in the "oil war" which has just been started by the Standard Oil Trust against the Shell Royal Dutch combine their old kerosene position has been turned. There is every reason to anticipate—as we shall see hereafter—that the Standard Oil Trust will retire from this latest rate-cutting contest much poorer in purse and in prestige than when it entered upon it. There are shrewd observers who believe that its cruel monopoly has reached its zenith and that we are about to witness the first stages of "The Decline and Fall of the Rockefeller Empire."

The Dramatis Personæ.

The principal figures in this great combination deserve a passing word of introduction. There is first its founder, its creator, Mr. John D. Rockefeller, who with superhuman courage has convinced himself in his retirement that he has been the agent of Providence, and that his business career entitles him to moralise to Sunday schools and Bible classes. "I hope you young men are all careful. I believe it is a religious duty to get all the money you can; get it fairly, religiously, and honestly—and give away all you can." So spoke Mr. Rockefeller to his son's Bible class in New York on March 27, 1897, and it gives a complete picture of his life. The combination of Jekyll and Hyde is well brought out in Miss Ida M. Tarbell's "History of the Standard Oil Company," the ablest investigation ever made of this combination. Miss Tarbell says:—

Mr. Rockefeller was "good." There was no more faithful Baptist in Cleveland than he. Every enterprise of that church he had supported liberally from his youth. He gave to its poor. He visited its sick. He was simple and frugal in his habits. He never went to the theatre, never drank wine. He gave much time to the training of his children, seeking to develop in them his own habits of economy and charity. Yet he was willing to strain every nerve to obtain for himself special and unjust privileges from the railroads which were bound to ruin every man in the oil business not sharing them with him. Religious emotion and sentiments of charity, propriety, and self-denial seem to have taken the place in him of notions of justice and regard for the rights of others.

In a character sketch of Mr. Rockefeller which she contributed to "McClure's Magazine" in January, 1905, Miss Tarbell tells this story:—

Even in his own Church men say, "He's a good Baptist, but look out how you trade with him." "I have been in business with John D. Rockefeller for thirty-five years," one of the ablest and richest and earliest of Mr. Rockefeller's colleagues once told me in a moment of forgetfulness, "and he would do me out of a dollar to-day; that is," he added, with a sudden reversion to the school of cant in which he had been trained—"that is if he could do it honestly."

In this picture Mr. Wm. Rockefeller hardly counts. The next figure in the gallery of oils is that of the late Mr. Henry H. Rogers, who died a few months ago—the "Iron Man" of the Standard directorate. Writing in Chapter III. of "Frenzied Finance" in "Everybody's Magazine" for August, 1904, Mr. T. W. Lawson, who knew him well, thus described Mr. Rogers:—

Whenever the bricks, cabbages, or aged eggs were being presented to "Standard Oil," always was Henry H. Rogers's towering form and defiant eye in the foreground where they flew thickest. Whenever Labour howled its anathemas at "Standard Oil" and the Rockefellers and other stout-hearted generals and captains of this band of merry moneymakers would begin to discuss conciliation and retreat, it was always Henry H. Rogers who fired at his associates his now famous panacea for all opposition, "We'll see Standard Oil in hell before we will allow any body of men on earth to dictate how we shall conduct our business."

In another passage in "Frenzied Finance" Mr. Lawson wrote of him:—

Rogers is a marvellously able man, and one of the best fellows living. He is considerate, kindly, generous, helpful, and everything a man should be to his friends. But when it comes to business—his kind of business—when he turns away from his better self and goes aboard his pirate brig and hoists the Jolly Roger, God help you. . . . He is a relentless, ravenous creature as pitiless as a shark, knowing no law of God or man in the execution of his purpose.

Now that Mr. Rogers is dead, the active figure in the trust is Mr. John Dustin Archbold, who was originally an active opponent of the Standard and its rebates. Since he joined its circle Mr. Archbold has figured in two sensational episodes. He was one of the defendants in the charge of conspiring to blow up a rival refinery at Buffalo, and escaped through the judge withdrawing the case from the jury. He was the writer of the famous letters to politicians which Mr. Randolph Hearst disclosed in the Presidential campaign of 1908.

Of the rest of these men it is necessary to say less. They were very diverse in their character. One of them, Henry M. Flagler, was the pioneer of the vast hotels which line the Florida coast and make it a winter resort for rich Americans. William T. Wardwell, the treasurer of the Standard Oil Company, was an ardent teetotaler, and more than once ran as Prohibitionist candidate for the Presidency before his connection with Standard Oil was so notorious. Many of them were Scotch Presbyterians, but the late Mr. Daniel O'Day, the man who faced fierce obloquy as the manager of the Standard's pipe-line monopoly, was an Irish Catholic, who died a year or two ago, leaving several millions behind him. The younger generation is growing old now, and sons of both John and William Rockefeller have entered the business, carrying on the traditions of the greatest combine on earth.

The Tentacles of the Octopus.

We will now proceed to trace the ramifications of the vast organisation which these men have built up and control in America and England. The full list of the subsidiary companies is so long that it is impossible and unnecessary to print all the names. But a selection of them will indicate the vastness and variety of the Rockefeller interests. They are taken from the report of the U.S. Government Commissioner of Corporations on the Petroleum Industry (Part I., Table 8, p. 84), supplemented by one or two other unimpeachable sources of information. The central company of this joint-stock octopus is now the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, which holds large blocks of stock in the other companies. It has a capital of $100,000,000 of common stock and $10,000,000 of preferred stock. Among its directors are John D. Rockefeller, William Rockefeller, Henry M. Flagler, John Dustin Archbold, Wesley H. Tilford, Frank Q. Barstow, Charles M. Pratt, Edward T. Bedford, Walter Jennings, James A. Moffett, C. W. Harkness, John D. Rockefeller, jun., Oliver H. Payne, and A. C. Bedford. This company controls nine companies which are principally engaged in refining oils:—

| | Capital. Dols. |
|---|---|
| Atlantic Refining Company, Pennsylvania | 5,000,000 |
| Solar Refining Company, Ohio | 500,000 |
| Standard Oil Company of California | 25,000,000 |
| Standard Oil Company of Kansas | 1,000,000 |
| Standard Oil Company of Indiana | 1,000,000 |
| Standard Oil Company of New York | 15,000,000 |
| Security Oil Company, Texas | 3,000,000 |
| Standard Oil Company of Ohio | 3,500,000 |
| Corsicana Refining Company | partnership |

Then comes a group of lubricating oil companies:—

| | Dols. |
|---|---|
| Vacuum Oil Company, N.Y. | 2,500,000 |
| Borne, Scrymser and Co., N.J. | 200,000 |
| Chesebrough Manufacturing Company, N.Y. | 500,000 |
| Galena Signal Oil Company, Penn. | 10,000,000 |
| Swan and Finch Company, N.Y. | 1,000,000 |

It will surprise many readers on this side to find in this list the name of the Chesebrough Company, which lights the London sky with the magic word "Vaseline," but for years that article has paid its tribute to the Standard Oil Trust. This story was told by Mr. John D. Archbold in evidence in the proceedings by the United States Government against the Trust in the State of Missouri, where much evidence, to which we shall hereafter have to refer, was taken. Mr. Archbold then stated that the Standard Oil Trust acquired 2,549 shares in the Cheseborough Manufacturing Company, which was a little more than a majority of the stock. Mr. Chesebrough and the other minority stockholders continued to carry on the business in the old name until the present day. Vaseline, of course, is a product of petroleum. With regard to the Galena Signal Oil Company, which manufactures railway lubricating and signal oils, it is stated by the United States Commissioner of Corporations in his report (Part II., p. x.) that American railway officials are compelled to purchase the Galena products at higher prices than their competitors offer, because of the influence of the Standard Oil interests as large consignors, or their power in financial circles, exerted on the railway boards. The Vacuum Oil Company, which also appears in this list, became a Standard corporation as long ago as 1879, and it was the company concerned in the sensational prosecution of several Standard Oil men at Buffalo for the alleged conspiracy to blow up a rival refinery. Its speciality is the compounding of lubricating oils.

Foreign Marketing Companies.

The list of companies next includes three crude oil-producing companies, and thirteen pipe line companies. The largest of these is the National Transit Company, of Pennsylvania, with a capital of $25,000,000. Three others have capitals of $10,000,000 each. Another is the Manhattan Oil Company, of Ohio, with a capital of $150,000, of which more will be said presently. Next comes the Union Tank Line Company, of New Jersey, capital $3,500,000, which owns and operates railway tank cars. Sixteen natural gas companies follow, and then six American marketing companies, of which the Waters-Pierce Oil Company, of Missouri, has had, perhaps, the most remarkable modern history. Next we come to the following foreign marketing companies, the second of which is duly recorded in the files at Somerset House:—

| | Capital. |
|---|---|
| Anglo-American Oil Company (London) | £1,000,000 |
| Vacuum Oil Company, Limited (London) | £55,000 |
| American Petroleum Company (Holland) | Fl.7,850,000 |
| Amerikanische Petroleum Company (Germany) | M.200,000 |
| Deutsche-Amerikanische Company (Germany) | M.30,000,000 |
| Danish Petroleum Company | Not stated. |
| Konigsberger-Handels Company (Germany) | M.2,300,000 |
| Mannheim-Bremen Company (Germany) | M.3,000,000 |
| Korff Refinery Company (Bremen) | M.1,500,000 |
| Stettin-Amerikanische Company (Germany) | Not stated. |
| Roumanian-American Petroleum Company | Lei.12,500,000 |
| Société ci-devant H. Reith and Cie. (Belgium) | Fr.1,650,000 |
| Italian American Petroleum Company | Not stated. |
| Vacuum Oil Company (Austria) | Kr.10,000,000 |
| International Oil Company (Japan) | Yen.12,000,000 |
| Imperial Oil Company (Canada) | Not stated. |
| Colonial Oil Company (Africa and Australasia) | $250,000 |

But even this long list does not complete the companies in this combination. It does not include many businesses which have been bought by the Standard and are now run as parts of one or other of the companies given. For example, the Devoe Manufacturing Company, which manufactures all the tin cases in which oil and petrol are shipped, is now absorbed in the Standard Oil Company of New York. Then there is the Oswego Manufacturing Company, manufacturers of wood packing cases and barrels; the American Wick Manufacturing Company, which made lamp wicks; and Thompson, Bedford, and Company, who had a large European trade in lubricating oils before their absorption. In addition, there should be added a number of Vacuum Oil companies which have been established abroad, in Copenhagen, Genoa, Paris, Hamburg, Moscow, Stockholm, Bombay, Kobe, and Cape Town.

The "Manhattan Oil" Mystery.

The two British companies in the above list—the Anglo-American Oil Company, Limited, and the Vacuum Oil Company, Limited—will require our attention at a later stage. But there are two British companies not in the list which were alleged by the U.S. Government counsel in the Missouri litigation to be Standard Oil tentacles. Their whole history is so characteristic of Standard Oil tactics that it merits close and immediate attention. They are the General Industrials Development Syndicate, Limited, registered at Somerset House in 1899, and the London Commercial Trading and Investment Company, Limited, registered in 1903. As these were two companies which Mr. J. D. Archbold, in the Missouri proceedings, swore he had never heard of, their history throws a valuable light on how the Standard does its business. Taking the General Industrials first, we are brought back to an American company, the Manhattan Oil Company, of Ohio, which was organised by Commodore E. C. Benedict and Mr. A. N. Brady, in 1890. They laid a pipe line from the Lima oil fields to Chicago in order to supply crude oil to the People's Gas Light and Coke Company of that city, in which they were interested, at a more reasonable rate than the Standard would supply it. The Manhattan Company also had a large number of tank cars and a refinery in Galatea, Ohio. Evidence was given before the Inter-State Commerce Commission that independent Cleveland refiners were met in the Lima oil field by this Manhattan Oil Company, which cut off their supplies by paying "premiums" to oil well-owners in certain districts to send it their oil. The Manhattan Company professed to be independent, but its proceedings induced the really independent refiners to suspect that it had become a Standard auxiliary.

When the U.S. Government started the proceedings in the Missouri courts a part of the truth came to light. Evidence was then given by Mr. A. N. Brady that in 1899 he sold the entire stock of the Manhattan Oil Company for 615,000 dols. to an English company, this General Industrials Development Syndicate, Limited, which also took over a mortgage of $800,000. But Mr. Brady wanted to ensure that his gas plants in Chicago should have a supply of gas-oil, and he testified that part of the terms of his contract for the sale of the Manhattan stock to the English company was that the Standard Oil Company of Indiana (one of the branches of the Trust) should supply him with gas-oil (A. N. Brad's evidence in the Missouri case). It was sufficiently remarkable that this unknown English company should be able to secure a favourable contract for Brady's gas-oil from the Standard, but still more remarkable incidents followed. Immediately after the purchase of the stock of the Manhattan that company's refinery at Galatea, Ohio, was bought by the Solar Refining Company of Ohio (admittedly a Standard company); the Union Tank Line Company (another Standard company) bought all the Manhattan's tank cars, and the Ohio Oil Company (a Standard tentacle which is in the oil-well business) bought the Manhattan Company's wells. After this division of its property the Manhattan Oil Company continued as a pipe-line company, posing as an "independent" oil company and offering these "premiums." Then came the delicate question as to who owned it! Here is an extract from Mr. Archbold's cross-examination:—

Q. Do you know the General Industrials Development Syndicate, Limited, of London?—A. I do not.

Q. Of London, England?—A. I do not.

Q. You know nothing about it?—A. I do not.

Q. Is it owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, by any company of the Standard Oil combination?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. You would be apt to know it, wouldn't you, if it was?—A. I think I would.

Q. Do you know the firm of Budd, Johnson, and Jecks, London, solicitors?—A. I don't know them.

Q. Did you ever hear of them?—A. I may have heard of them in connection with this inquiry.

Q. Do you know Mr. Maxwell?—A. I do not.

Q. Connected with the firm. Mr. Maxwell or Mr. Herbert Johnson?—A. I do not know either of them.

Q. Did you ever hear of them?—A. I may, in connection with this firm. I don't even recall the names now.

The Anglo-American Oil Company's Loans.

Mr. Kellogg, counsel for the U.S. Government, pointed out that the New York books of the Anglo-American Oil Company showed that the company between 1899 and 1906 loaned over £540,000 to Mr. James McDonald, who was then its managing director, and he suggested that it was to provide the money to enable the General Industrials Development Syndicate to buy the Manhattan and yet conceal that the Standard were the purchasers. Mr. Archbold was in his best non mi ricordo vein. Although he was a director of the Anglo-American Oil Company up to 1907 he could not tell for what purpose that large sum of money was lent to Mr. McDonald by the company. Neither the auditor nor the comptroller of the Standard Oil Company in New York could tell why their London branch did this, and Mr. Archbold did not even know whether the loan had been repaid! He was still more pointedly questioned about the matter:—

Q. Isn't it a fact, Mr. Archbold, that the Standard Oil Company, or some of its companies, indirectly owns the Industrials Development Syndicate, Limited, and organised it?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. You keep pretty close track of companies starting business in competition with you in this country, don't you?—A. We do.

Q. You seem to be able to produce a list here of every concern engaged in the oil business in the country, didn't you?—A. As nearly as we can keep track of it; yes.

Q. Is this General Industrials Development Syndicate, Limited, engaged in the oil business anywhere else?—A. I do not know.

Q. You never investigated it?—A. I never heard of their being in any place else. They may. I never have heard of it.

Q. And yet it bought the Manhattan Company and then caused the Manhattan to sell you the refineries, the producing wells, the cars, and continued doing business with you, and you never looked into the Development Company. . . . You never investigated to find out who the English company was?—A. No, not beyond that.

The last question of counsel is a sufficient commentary in itself on Mr. Archbold's pretended ignorance of the General Industrials Development Syndicate, but further light will be thrown presently upon the relations of this London company with the Standard group. In the meantime, it will be convenient to consider, at the same time, the second of these English companies, the London Commercial Trading and Investment Company. Evidence was given in the Missouri prosecution by Mr. H. Bayne, the son of a well-known New York banker, that all the stock of the Security Oil Company of Texas, another professedly "independent" concern, had been acquired by this London company. Texas has a very rigid anti-trust law, and therefore there was an additional reason for caution in allowing the real purchasers to become known. Mr. Archbold was as discreet as ever. Mr. Kellogg put it to him that cheques drawn by the Anglo-American Oil Company to the order of the National Provincial Bank of England in London were by that bank turned over to the Bank of England, and that cheques were then drawn on that bank to solicitors to pay for the Security Oil Company's stock. Now, although Mr. Archbold has been for so many years a director of the Anglo-American Oil Company, he could neither confirm nor deny this remarkable story. He had never heard of such a transaction, and when asked whether the Standard directly or indirectly owned or controlled the London Commercial Trading Company he could only reply, "Not to my knowledge."

Light at Somerset House.

It is time, in considering this painful case of "loss of memory," to turn to the records of these two companies in the Registry of Joint Stock Companies at Somerset House. They present singular features of resemblance; in fact, save for the disparity in age, they might be twins. Both companies have as solicitors and large original shareholders the members of the firm of Budd, Johnson, and Jecks, of 24, Austin Friars, E.C., whose names Mr. Archbold was unable to recall. Both companies have the same offices—27, Walbrook; the same secretary—Mr. J. Morgan Richards Francis; and the same auditor. Both companies have adopted the idea of issuing share warrants to bearer for the whole of their capital, by which device they avoid returning any subsequent list of shareholders to Somerset House. Both companies hit upon the idea of having but one director, and both were fortunate enough to select for that onerous task the same gentleman—Mr. Horace Maxwell Johnson, barrister-at-law, of Hickwells, Chailey, Sussex. But these strange coincidences do not end here. The first list of shareholders in each case contains some remarkable resemblances. In the case of the General Industrials Development Syndicate it was as follows:—

| | Shares. |
|---|---|
| Henry Hassall, 32, Dartmouth Park Road | 1 |
| E. G. Flower, Elm Villa, Elm Road, Sidcup | 1 |
| Robert Cave, 26, Beversbrook Road, Tufnell Park | 1 |
| Sydney Lowenthal, 59, Sidney Street, South Kensington | 1 |
| Francis Glover Sharpe, 16, Foyle Road, Westcombe Park | 1 |
| Ernest Luff Smith, 73, Ramsden Road, Balham | 1 |
| Horace Maxwell Johnson, 1, Dr. Johnson's Buildings, barrister | 1 |
| John Wreford Budd, Murray Johnson, Herbert Walter Johnson, Arthur Statham Jecks, all of 24, Austin Friars, solicitors, jointly | 399,993 |
| | 400,000 |

Turning to the London Commercial Trading Company, we find the following names:—

| | Shares. |
|---|---|
| Henry Hassall, 5, Florence Road, Finsbury Park | 1 |
| E. G. Flower, 279, High Road, Lee | 1 |
| Robert Cave, 26, Beversbrook Road, Tufnell Park | 1 |
| F. G. Sharpe, 27, Walbrook | 1 |
| E. Luff Smith, 73, Ramsden Road, Balham | 1 |
| John Rayner, 8, Woodside Villas, Ewell Road, Surbiton | 1 |
| G. Dudley Colclough, 47, Inverness Terrace | 1 |
| John Wreford Budd, Murray Johnson, Herbert Walter Johnson, Arthur Statham Jecks, of 24, Austin Friars, jointly | 722,500 |
| | 722,507 |

(On February 23, 1904, 2,493 more shares were allotted to Messrs. Budd, Johnson, and Jecks, making up the total capital of £725,000.)

It must be understood, of course, that the appearance of the names of English lawyers in these lists neither conveys any reflection of any kind upon them nor identifies them in any way with the operations of the Standard Oil Trust in the United States or elsewhere. Messrs. Budd, Johnson, and Jecks are a well-known and highly respected firm, and it must be assumed that they only appear in these transactions between the companies in their professional capacity.

We find, therefore, that out of the original shareholders in the General Industrials, nine appeared in the list of the London Commercial four years afterwards. A tenth, Mr. Horace Maxwell Johnson, the managing director, appeared on October 2, 1903 (Mr. E. G. Flower's share was transferred to him). In both cases almost the entire assets of the company are represented in the balance-sheet by shares of foreign companies. In the case of the General Industrials, out of its £100,526 assets £94,613 represented such shares, while in the case of the London Commercial this item represents £718,685 out of total assets of £734,979.

There is only one difference in the history of these companies. While the London Commercial has increased its original capital of £110,000 to £725,000, the General Industrials has reduced its capital. It consisted at first of 400,000 £1 shares, but in June, 1901, the capital was reduced to £230,000 by the repayment of 8s. 6d. on each share. On December 13, 1905, the capital was further reduced to £120,000 by the repayment of a further 5s. 6d. on each share, and on August 10, 1906, this was further reduced to £100,000 by refunding a further 1s. per share. This world is full of strange coincidences, but it is distinctly worth noting that the capital of the Manhattan Oil Company showed a synchronous tendency to fall. From an exhibit put in by Mr. Kellogg in the Missouri case it appeared that the capital of the Manhattan Oil Company was reduced from $2,000,000 (£400,000) to $500,000 (£100,000) on May 23, 1902, and to $150,000 (£30,000) on October 23, 1905.

Mr. Brady testified that when Mr. Herbert Johnson, of London, came to him in New York he said the General Industrials were "in the oil business, but wished to purchase a going company, with wells, and land, and cars, and pipe-lines:"

Q. And refineries?—A. Refineries.

Q. Now if he wished to purchase a going business, why did they sell their wells and tank cars and refineries?

Mr. Milburn (Standard Oil counsel): Does Mr. Brady know that?

Q. Do you know?—A. No, I do not know that they did.

A Standard Oil Agent.

One other remarkable feature about this General Industrials Company may be mentioned. Mr. Brady produced at this trial the following cable that he received:—

August 31, 1899, London. To A. N. Brady, 54, Wall Street, N.Y.—Syndicate accepts options. John H. Cuthbert, its agent, will call on you to arrange details and payment. He has full authority.—Johnson.

This was signed by Mr. Herbert W. Johnson, the London solicitor, who, with the assistance of several other solicitors, a barrister, and an accountant, was going into the oil business on this large scale. But, to use a once-famous American political phrase, Mr. John H. Cuthbert was "the nigger in the wood-pile." It is his presence that finally "gives away" the carefully hidden origin of the General Industrials. When Mr. J. D. Archbold was first questioned about Mr. Cuthbert he was as forgetful as ever:—

Who was Mr. Cuthbert? Do you know him?—A. I knew a Mr. Cuthbert.

Q. In 1899 he was in the employ of the Standard Oil Company, wasn't he—John H. Cuthbert?—A. I do not recall that he was.

Q. He had been in your employ, hadn't he, in some of your companies?—A. I do not recall that he had been.

Q. Do you know him?—A. I did know him.

Q. Where was his place of business?—A. My recollection would be that he was employed with the Tide Water Oil Company.

Q. Didn't he use to be employed by one of the Standard Oil companies?—A. He may have been earlier, away back. I do not remember distinctly. I am inclined to think that he was—in the earlier years—employed by one of our companies.

After the luncheon adjournment on the same day, however, Mr. Archbold's memory somewhat improved:—

Q. Isn't it a fact that Mr. John H. Cuthbert was the Standard's representative in the Tide Water Company as director?—A. He went there not specially as our representative, but left our employ and went to them, because I imagine they offered him greater inducement in the way of salary. I knew of no other reason.

Q. Is it not a matter of fact that he solely represented the Standard Oil Company as a director in the Tide Water Company?—A. I think he was there as a servant of the business.

The truth about Mr. John H. Cuthbert's position in relation to the Standard Oil Trust is clearly shown by the following extract from the Report of the U.S. Commissioner of Corporations on the Petroleum Industry (Part I., page 54):—

About the same time (1881) Standard interests succeeded in acquiring a minority interest in the Tide Water Company's stock. This move, coupled with the continual hostility of the railroads, led to a virtual surrender of the Tide Water interests, and an agreement was reached in 1883, by which they substantially became, and have since remained, a part of the Standard Oil system.

To sum up the history of this General Industrials Development Syndicate, we have an American oil company sold to a London company with no list of shareholders, with a managing director who is a barrister, after an examination and valuation of the property by a Standard Oil employee. We find as one of the terms of the deal that the Standard Oil Company—who, according to Mr. Archbold, had no interest in this transaction—should guarantee a supply of crude oil at a low rate for ten years to the vendors' Chicago gas company. Then we find all the assets of the Manhattan Company transferred to various Standard Oil companies, except the pipe lines, and these pipe lines used for the purpose of collecting oil for Standard companies, and paying premiums to producers to prevent them supplying oil to "independent" refineries which the Standard desires to kill. All this, taken with the evasive and obviously untruthful answers of Mr. Archbold, can lead to but one conclusion as to the real origin of the General Industrials. When the facts are considered with regard to the parallel case of the London Commercial Trading Company, that conclusion is strengthened still more.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE LATE AUSTRIAN AMBASSADOR.

COUNT KHEVENHÜLLER METSCH, who made the acquaintance of Paris under Prince Richard Metternich, did not fear to be original or to break away from the type of Austrian diplomat. Without imitating Bismarck, he followed him in trying to give the impression of a free frankness of speech and manner, avoiding, however, rudeness. He imitated the Crown Prince Rudolph in not being a whiskerando and in having a short, full beard and moustache, to which curling-irons added an appearance of fulness and of careless growth which was deceptive, but an agreeable falsehood to the eye. He liked to tell good stories drawn from his own experience, and he told them amusingly and with snap and point. I don't know why it was that he shared Bismarck's dislike for the Battenberg family, and tried to take them down in speaking of them. He personally prevented Prince Alexander from following up the victory of Slivnitza by, he said, going hot-foot on his fleetest horse from Belgrade to the battlefield and bullying the hero into staying quietly there. The advantages gained by the new Prince of Bulgaria over Milan were, the Count declared "on his honour," due to this circumstance. Things seemed to have come to a bad pass when, towards the close of the fray, he thought of ordering out his "reserve," which had been keeping well in the background. Reserve was a big designation for the merest handful—only an undisciplined regiment of Roumeliots. They had seized in a raid a keg of the coarse maize brandy of Servia, got drunk on it, and were snoring off the effects of the liquor when the order came to their colonel, who was in as bad a condition as any of his men. They had just sense enough of reality to feel terrified at the curses of the Prince's orderly officer, who took upon himself, pistol in hand at the colonel's ear, to order him and them to the front. In their fright they called on one and the other to run away. There was such a sauve qui peut, only they mistook the road, and instead of flying towards their homes went with a rush into the midst of the Servians, threw the latter into confusion, and enabled Alexander to rally his broken forces. The very last thing he expected when he did so was victory. He thought only to save honour. He seemed as drunk as any Roumeliot in his joyful surprise when the officers of his staff hurried up to hail him as a hero and a victor.

This account of the battle of Slivnitza tickled Bismarck prodigiously. When the Count brought it to him at Salzburg he found him reading a bundle of war correspondents' letters to the London papers. These gentlemen trumpeted to the top of their ability the skill and magnificent courage of Alexander. None of them had a word to say about the excellent work done by the drunken regiment. "That," said Bismarck, "is the way in which history is written. I saw as queer occurrences in the war of 1866 and in the course of our invading campaign in France." There was this difference: that our princes were the hard drinkers. Frederick Charles was nearly always in liquor of some sort—champagne, brandy, Burgundy, Marsala, or other heady wines that had been requisitioned. Moltke, Waldersee, and myself were constantly kept busy trying to remedy the blunders of our delightful princes."

The Count would never admit the possibility of Bulgaria going seriously to war under its Tsar Ferdinand. "Did you ever hear," he asked, "of the House of Coburg producing more than a single general?" "Who was he?" asked Clemenceau. "Parbleu! The one that your revolutionists so badly thrashed. When God decided that the constitutional monarchies of Europe should fall under the distaff, he created the House of Coburg to serve the regal heiresses as Prince Consorts." "But the first Leopold?" "He served as le beau Duke of Saxe-Coburg in the staff of the Emperor Alexander; as a lady-killing god in the private theatricals of the Court of Vienna, and notably as Jupiter making the conquest of Danaë in a shower of gold dust. The last gallant adventure of Queen Caroline of Naples, the aunt of the Emperor Francis II., was with Leopold. Thus qualified, he returned, none the better in health for his Viennese dissipations, to London, on Castlereagh's invitation, to secure the hand of the heiress to the crown. His nephew Ferdinand, when King-Consort of Portugal, used to grow deadly pale when he had to face his wife's soldiers at a review. The second King Leopold, now reigning rather as a rubber king than as King of the Belgians, always stuffed his ears with wadding when he expected artillery salutes. Nobody could imagine a more unmilitary figure than he presented on horseback reviewing troops. It used cruelly to mortify his Austrian wife before their separation. He frankly admitted that soldiering was not his vocation. No; Ferdinand of Bulgaria will never fire a gun against a single one of his neighbours."

It is to be noticed that the late Austrian Ambassador never got into a scrape, save with Count Kalnoky, for the free use he made of his critical faculty in judging the great ones of the earth. He enjoyed nothing more than a chat with Sir Edmund Monson, his colleague on so many occasions and in so many capitals. The latter was also very frank, but only became unrestrained with persons whom he felt he could trust.

Of the Empress Elizabeth, Count Khevenhüller said: "She came of an eccentric family, gifted with heroism and a sort of genius, but with no sense of reality. A more generous being never lived. Without wings, she wanted to fly like an angel, with the result that she constantly fell into mud and dust. She never counted the cost beforehand of any of her enterprises. Her collateral ancestors, the Winter King, Charles XII., and Christina of Sweden, had the same sort of reckless heroism, and were, as she became, the toys of fatality." Of the Empress Eugénie: "She appeared to me an étourdie—a madcap, as you say in England. This she owed to the Irish blood of her grandfather, Kirkpatrick, for he was an Irishman, who, being involved in some treasonable affair, ran away to America."

After his quarrel with Count Kalnoky the disgraced diplomat knew that as long as the Count remained in office he need never try to rise again to a post as Minister, much less ambassador. It was, therefore, no use humbling himself before him, and so he took a careless or sarcastic air whenever he ran against him in company or elsewhere. It was some small consolation to avenge himself on those who had prompted indirectly Kalnoky to strike. This he did by gaining the ear of Bismarck in his sojourns at Gastein. The waters there depressed him, and he found relief in listening to the very animated and amusing sallies, stories, and small talk, with a very serious basis, of the ex-Minister to Belgrade. Neither believed in the Balkaniques, as they called the small new States that had sprung up like mushrooms in Turkey in Europe. They were fated, like little fishes, to be devoured by the big Empires. Khevenhüller had foreknowledge of the kidnapping of Prince Alexander of Battenberg, and had the satisfaction of going up at a lunch at the Archduke Joseph's and saying to Kalnoky, "Did I not write to tell you this event was sure to take place?" Prince Alexander consoled himself for the loss of the Prussian Princess to whom he was engaged with the approval of her mother and British grandmother, and for that of his principality, which the Archduke John coveted. The consoler was a professional singer, the daughter of a valet. Alexander philosophically married her.

After a disgrace of five years Khevenhüller re-entered active service, and became Minister at Brussels. His private letters about the mercantile dealings of the King, the intrigues with Bismarck having the sovereignty of the Congo for their object, the life led by the Queen—an Austrian Princess—the different Queens of the Congo who reigned at Ostend and in the privacy of a villa near Laeken, must form a curious European chapter of history. Those that relate to the family affairs of the Belgian Royal family are in the Emperor's private archives, and those addressed to the Foreign Minister of the Empire in the archives of his Department. The late Ambassador died of an internal malady, after a third operation.

The sources of wealth of the Orleans family are the Condé estates excepting Chantilly, the estates in the Haute Marne, Brittany, and Auvergne, left by Mme. Adelaide to the Prince de Joinville and the Duc de Montpensier, the personality of Louis Philippe, said to be at the time of his death one of the very greatest of European fortunes, the remnant of the appanages of the Ducs d'Orléans confiscated by Louis Napoleon, the fortune derived by the Comtesse de Paris from her mother, the Duchesse de Montpensier, and from old Queen Christina, who, as Regent of Spain, and engaged in a slave trade company that operated in Cuba, never lost an opportunity to make money. She heaped up riches almost to the day of her death. The house she had standing in extensive grounds in the Champs Elysées so rose in value that her heirs sold it for twenty times more than she paid for it. Prince Antoine de Montpensier inherited the estates in Italy left by the late Duchesse de Galliera to his father. The will of Louis Philippe, made in England after the Revolution, was proved according to English law. The Royal privilege of privacy was extended to it at Doctors' Commons. Queen Marie Amélie was the sole legatee. She followed closely the instructions he had given her as to the shares in which he wished her to divide it—the Comte de Paris, and the next greatest to the Duc de Chartres. Otherwise they would have had nothing but some shares of the Anzin Collieries left by their father. They are now of unbelievable great value. When in 1872 the Versailles Assembly restored the remnant of the appanage estates, they were valued at 52,000,000 francs plus 12,000,000 in the hands of the domain. This fortune went to the seven children of Louis Philippe in equal shares, or to the children of the Duchess of Wurtemberg and the Queen of the Belgians, also in equal shares. The Duc d'Aumale came into the fortune of his wife, the only daughter of the Prince of Salerno, and of his mother-in-law.

The native place of the Queen Dowager of Portugal is York House, Twickenham. She stayed there until she had completed her seventh year, when all the different members of the Orleans family went to live in France. In England, the Duc d'Aumale resided at Orleans House, adjacent to York House; the Duc de Chartres at Morgan Houses, Ham Common; the Duc de Nemours at Bushey House, lent him by Queen Victoria. The old Queen of the French had died previous to the Revolution of 1870 at Claremont, which King Leopold had lent her and Louis Philippe in 1848. I do not know where the Prince de Joinville quartered himself. He was of roving humour, an inveterate globe trotter, used his pencil very cleverly, was deaf as a post, a tease, affected sailorly frankness, and when in England meditated the purchase of a whole region in the United States, where he could farm on a grand scale. The aged Queen prevented him. Louis Napoleon confiscated one of the estates of Louis Philippe's sons, and obliged them to sell them. They did so; the sales were fictitious, and the Princes came into their enjoyment in 1872. They all had the blessing of heaps of wealth, and understood how to husband it. It is pleasant to think the exiled Queen is no worse off in England than were her father's uncle and great-uncles.

laborious. Those of the Flemish parts of France are rather pig-headed. The Picards and their Ardennes mates are choleric, but not wanting in good sense. The Bretons on the Ouest are better sailors than railway men. They and their Norman helpmates drink too freely of the brandy made of cider. The Normans are not obliging, and are sure never to do works of supererogation. Their most pleasing trait is a fondness for roses. One often sees a Norman stoker or engine-driver returning to his post with a rose in his button-hole.

An unlooked-for result of the strike is the eclipse that Hervé, the anti-militarist, has undergone. The anti-military feeling is now so strong that there is hardly any work left for him as an apostle. The order for the mobilisation of the men on strike, to prevent them exercising their legal right to strike, is, I hear, furiously attacked in the canteens and other places where soldiers gather. The rising prices of the necessaries of life must keep alive this anger. More than one half of the soldiers now in the ranks will soon have to face these prices as wage-earners. The womenkind of those freshly released from active service are as Job's wife. The order for mobilisation, rather curiously, was signed some time before the strike by President Fallières, on the eve of his departure for his vineyards in the Lot et Garonne. Blanks were left for the date and the signature of General Brun, and the document handed back to the Premier. The Socialists hurl the epithets of "Traitor" and "Judas" at M. Briand. He is neither, though the last act of Judas proved in its self-condemnation that he had a conscience.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THERE are the giants of heredity; they are on stilts, dear Lady Betty. Education and enterprise have now bred in this country thousands of giants of natural growth, and the former are, therefore, decreasing hourly in power and importance. The days of the stilt system are numbered. The treasures of the hereditary great are being removed to the homes of the financiers; the manufacturers are replacing the hereditary families on the land, and the transfer of power in politics is almost complete. It is an automatic revolution.

The giants of natural growth assume that they have succeeded to the privileges enjoyed by their predecessors on stilts—a supposition which is altogether erroneous. The stilt system was established by force; the new conditions are dependent on freedom.

* * * * * *

William Evans, a giant, was porter to Charles I., and had as a fellow servant Jeffry Hudson, a dwarf. At a masque at court the giant drew out of his pocket the dwarf, to the great amazement of the King and the guests. The Tory Party now draws out of its pocket a diminutive programme of reform, a proceeding which is causing general amusement.

THE TRAFFIC IN WORN-OUT POLICIES.

ARTHUR BALFOUR, sixty-one, politician, no official address, was charged with ill-treating a policy.

The constable said that the prisoner advocated at a public meeting the continuance of the House of Lords and resistance to Progress. The policy was in a most feeble condition, and witness sent for an ambulance.

According to the medical evidence, the policy, which was very lame, was hundreds of years old, and had repeatedly been condemned by the constituencies.

The magistrate said he could not understand why Tory politicians undertook the trouble and expense of parading these lame and worn-out policies all over the country.

The prisoner, in reply, contended that even a Tory politician must live, and that this was his only means of earning a political livelihood.

The magistrate sentenced the prisoner to seven years' exclusion from office.

A friend of Brummell, who was visiting him when the latter was dressing, repeatedly asked which was the lake the "Beau" admired most in Cumberland. "Robinson," called Brummell. "Sir?" answered the valet. "Which of the lakes do I admire?" "Windermere," replied the servant. "Ah! yes, Windermere," said Brummell; "so it is, Windermere."

The public in England now seems more and more disposed to be dependent for its opinions upon the pronouncements of the press.

The circumstance has probably inspired a correspondent to write the following letter:—

"Turf Club.

"Sir,—Could you kindly tell me how to have a name put on the flattery list? Dowagers of eighty are still daily described in the newspapers as prominent beauties of the time; notoriously incompetent officials as 'distinguished' servants of the State; unsuccessful diplomatists as 'astute'; authors of meagre ability as literary marvels of the age, and actors of moderate capacity as rivals to the theatrical celebrities of the past. An unintelligent friend of mine wishes to attain transient fame without efficiency or effort."

* * * * * *

The Times is always a gentleman. The following comments which appeared in the "leading article" in its columns on the Crippen case represent accurately the sentiments of every right-minded man and woman in the country:—

"Only one feature of the trial is to be regretted. It had some accessories which it is hoped will not attend future trials for murder, and against which it is to be earnestly desired judges will set their faces. A criminal court is not a show-room, nor is such a trial of the nature of a matinée: the Old Bailey is not a place to which fashionable ladies may fitly go in search of the latest sensation, where actors may hope to pick up suggestions as to a striking gesture or a novel expression, and where descriptive writers may look for good copy."

It is yet to be decided which is the more acute, physical or mental torture. We have so far advanced in civilisation that it would generally be considered discreditable for any man or woman to be unnecessarily present, for instance, at the flogging of a culprit. The "fashionable" woman is now permitted to descend to almost any depth, the actor to ascend to almost any height. The public, however, will insist on drawing the line at their being present unnecessarily at the protracted mental torture of a fellow-creature on trial for his life. "He pales!" "He is paralysed!" "He is prostrate!" Omitting shrieks, what other symptoms of agony did the victim at the stake, on the rack, or on the wheel provide?

The dock is the scaffold to all intents and purposes to the prisoner against whom the jury has recorded the verdict of guilty. The sentence of death pronounced by the judge draws as it were the bolt, and the prisoner drops from the dock into an interval of life which amounts to little less than death. From the outer world the prisoner is almost completely cut off—from its charms and annoyances, its activities, its interests, friends, acquaintances, and opponents, from its hopes and alarms. Is this virtual execution a scene to which a privileged public should be admitted, and which any proper-minded person would attend unnecessarily? It may be added that our King and Queen, the embodiments of all which is kind, strongly disapprove of such conduct. Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FORTUNE-HUNTING PARSONS.

Sir,—In the current issue of Truth, speaking of the shortage of candidates for ordination, you say that to induce a man to accept the position of a curate as things are at present he must have "either private means, influence with the dispensers of patronage, or such a burning enthusiasm for the clerical calling that prudential considerations do not trouble him."

May I suggest another consideration that may easily weigh with young men who are not devoid of "prudential considerations" in selecting the Church as their profession—the opportunity of making a good marriage? That clergymen have, of all men, the best opportunity of picking up comfortably dowered brides is obvious, and few people, I should think, will deny that they avail themselves pretty freely of their opportunities. I would not suggest that, as a rule, they "go into the Church" with that object, but it has been my fortune to meet at least two who may be fairly suspected of having had it in view from the first, and I should think most people know parsons who have certainly set this object sedulously before them after a few years' experience of clerical life. How many curates are there who marry well-to-do spinsters or widows before they are forty, and then retire from the active exercise of their profession? Statistics on this point might be instructive. The number is certainly large in proportion to the whole number of clergy, and no other profession can show anything at all like it.

My point is that these facts, being more or less notorious, are likely to have the effect of attracting to the clerical profession a certain number of men who have neither "burning enthusiasm" for it nor any qualification for adorning it.—Yours obediently,

A Layman.

WESTERN MEN AND EASTERN MORALS.

Dear Sir,—Having read with much interest your articles under the above heading, though in no way personally concerned in the subject under discussion, may I be allowed to express my appreciation of the courage and discretion that has been shown in the treatment of the subject in Truth? The correspondence which you have published seems to leave no room for doubt about the facts, and I, for one, am glad to know the facts, and I think, further, that the stay-at-home Englishmen like myself should know these facts, which, like many others of a similar nature, are apt to be concealed by false modesty on the part of public writers and speakers. I do not believe that this evil—for an evil it undoubtedly is—would have grown to its present dimensions if the light of publicity had been thrown upon it earlier. Reticence about such matters does nothing but mischief.

In saying that the thing is an evil, I am not passing judgment on the men who are parties to it, nor using a puritanical standard of morality. On the contrary, the arguments put forward by your correspondents seem to me not only plausible, but, from their own point of view, legitimate. They make me think that under the same circumstances I myself should probably have followed the local custom. Nevertheless, when we think of the position of the children and the relation of their fathers to them the results are evil. It is difficult to believe that they are otherwise to the women; while as for the men, an Englishman who has lived in concubinage from early manhood in a country where this is a prevalent custom must be in some degree the worse for it if he subsequently returns to his own country, whether to marry and raise a family or not.

Nothing impresses me more in the correspondence you have published than the contention of a medical officer that for the European in a tropical country continence is neither possible nor expedient. Granting that this is so, can it be disputed that a duty rests upon firms which employ young Englishmen in such countries to put them in a position to marry? The contention of one of your correspondents in this week's issue that English girls are not fit wives for men employed in the East is quite beside the point and inconclusive. It would apply equally at home or in any part of the world to men of limited means who cannot afford to keep wives in luxury and idleness; and if the writer means that married life is more expensive in Burma and Malacca than at home, the obvious answer is that in that case employees should be paid in proportion. That European wives are out of place in the "jungle" one can readily understand; but a married man need not be always tied to his wife's apron string, nor is it necessary to insist that every employee shall be required to marry. The point seems to me to be that the desirability of marriage should be recognised, that employers should pay their men a sufficient wage to enable them to marry, and that all possible arrangements should be made to suit the convenience of a married staff. The conditions of the case also suggest that mere boys ought not to be taken into service in the East. Soldiers are not sent to India under twenty. There must be equally good reasons against lads being engaged any younger for hard work in Burma, Malacca, or Ceylon. And as they are not under the discipline of soldiers, it would seem desirable on moral grounds that they should not go out under twenty-one, at least.

Your articles began with an indictment of the regulations and arrangements "in restraint of marriage" made by a company trading in Burma. Everything that has followed shows that such a policy on the part of employers is grossly immoral and the parent of widespread evil. It is most significant that the firm referred to—the Bombay Burma Corporation—has offered no apology for its attitude towards the marriage of the men on its staff, and that no other employer—except in the case of Assam—has intervened in this discussion. Whether or not this indicates a consciousness of the truth, the conclusion of the whole matter is that employers of European labour in the East are principally to blame for the lapse of so many Western men into Eastern morals.

I trust, Sir, that you will not cease to insist upon this view of the matter.—Yours faithfully, F. W. D.

Dear Sir,—I was extremely interested in the current issue of Truth and in the letters which you received from the East.

In my opinion, this discussion has established only one point, i.e., that concubinage exists in Burma, and this point has been conclusively established.

I do not hold, however, that we have any right to take others to task on the subject of their private lives. Concubinage and immorality in general exist in every known quarter of the globe, and are not restricted to Burma.

But in your issue of August 10 the point at issue was not one involving the private lives of individuals quartered in Burma, nor was the point of your article one on the merits and demerits of concubinage. The point was this, namely, the policy of a British firm who, while facilitating and tolerating concubinage, discouraged legal matrimony, and who, in order to discourage matrimony in the case of one (at least) of their assistants, resorted to methods of injustice and lack of consideration, and who made things so utterly impossible for him that he was compelled to throw up a good appointment.

I consider that such behaviour on the part of a firm deserves world-wide exposure, insomuch as its attitude is not generally known to outsiders.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully, An Interested Reader.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

The Rise in the Bank Rate—Markets Well Prepared—Will 5 per Cent. Be the Limit?—Buoyant Yankees—Consols Below 80.

FOR the City the principal event last week was the rise in the Bank Rate from 4 to 5 per cent. It found the markets well prepared, and on the view that the worst was now known the Stock Exchange as a whole swallowed the pill with resignation, one might even say with enjoyment. Five per cent. is, in normal times, effective in checking a raid on the Bank of England's reserves and attracting gold hither. Whether it will be sufficient this autumn cannot be said yet with certainty. Owing principally to Egypt, which, through the gathering of a record cotton crop, has obtained a big drawing power upon this country, the Bank's reserve is now down probably to less than twenty-two millions sterling, and, while nearly nine million sovereigns have already been exported to the land of the Pharaohs, it is doubtful whether the drain is over yet. India is also a prospective taker of gold from London, and later on South America may also require to import. A good deal will turn in the next week or two upon the attitude of the Bank of France. It may be that the central banking authorities in Paris, rather than see a 6 per cent. Bank Rate here, will agree to assist London in the event of further gold demands from Egypt and elsewhere. The rise in the Paris cheque is a pointer in the right direction. But up to the present the Bank of France has shown a desire to sit upon its gold, and, while its actual holding is huge—namely, £133,523,000—it is £11,500,000 less than a year ago, while the note circulation at £211,000,000 is £6,000,000 larger.

There has again been considerable activity in Yankees, and the rise made further progress. The advance in the Bank rate did practically nothing to check the advance; it may have been, as was suggested, that certain New York speculators have already made arrangements to finance themselves in London until the end of the year, but even so the fact that dearer money here was of no avail in checking bullish enthusiasm demonstrates the determination of powerful people to give stocks a run. The outlook for Yankees in the near future, judging by the attitude of the magnates, is for a market zig-zaging upwards. Gilt-edged stocks still fail to show elasticity. Consols, influenced by the Bank rate news and the revival of talk about a big naval loan, went below 80. The funds at present return a larger yield than at any time since the seventies, the yield being 3⅛ per cent., but still they remain dead out of fashion. The course of Home Rails has been comparatively uneventful. Prices have held their recent little recovery fairly well, but made no further progress. The ballot of the boilermakers, resulting in rejection of the terms already accepted by the men's union, was an adverse factor, though it did not have any marked effect, because it is felt that if the men go counter not only to the wishes of their employers but to those of their own union they can offer no lasting resistance. For one thing, the sinews of war would be lacking, as presumably no strike pay would be forthcoming. A feature of the week was a sharp spurt in Rhymney issues, due, it was rumoured, to the company's intention to re-deposit next month a Bill for the absorption of the Cardiff Railway and Docks.

RAILWAYS.

American Bonds for Investment—Some Safe Holdings that Yield 4 to 4½ per Cent.

Investors seeking safety and a yield of 4 to 4½ per cent. might with advantage study the attractions of American bonds. Those who will not touch the common shares of American railroads because of the manipulated character of the market and the big ups and downs that occur in prices need have no hesitation about buying bonds, for the prior charge issues of the leading American lines are gilt-edged investments. In Truth of August 24 I dealt with some American convertible bonds, which, in addition to giving adequate security and yields of 3¾ to 4 per cent., carried options to exchange into common shares on certain fixed terms. The bonds referred to were the 4 per cent. convertibles of the Atchison, Norfolk, Southern Pacific, and Union Pacific. They stand at higher levels now than when I referred to them, but are still worth attention. If Americans boom the convertible bonds must rise in sympathy because of the conversion rights; and if Americans slump, the fall in the bonds below existing levels cannot be much owing to the nature of the security. It is my present purpose, however, to deal with some of the most eligible non-convertible bonds, and I have found no difficulty in picking out several that are undeniably cheap.

One of the most attractive in the list is Central Pacific Through Short Line 4 per cent. first mortgage bonds. The Central Pacific road since the reorganisation in 1899 has made rapid progress, and for some years now its income has been from $4,000,000 to $6,000,000 over all fixed charges. The line is really an integral part of the Southern Pacific system, for the Southern Pacific holds the whole of the company's $67,275,500 Common stock, and guarantees its bond issues, as to principal and interest, including the issue under notice. As regards the working of the Southern Pacific guarantee, I may mention that for some years past net income has been sufficient to cover fixed charges twice over. The Through Short Line Fours are of the denomination of $1,000, have interest payable April 1 and October 1, and the principal is repayable on October 1, 1954, with the option to the company to call the bonds for redemption at 107½ on any interest date. The present price is 89-92, so that the bonds would return a yield of about 4½ per cent.

Atchison, Topeka, and Santé Fé 4 per cent. adjustment bonds are of the denominations of $500 and $1,000. They are secured on the same properties as the company's general mortgage bonds, but are subject thereto. Redemption is to take place in 1995. Interest is payable on November 1, but a certain number of bonds are stamped for half-yearly interest payments, namely on May 1 and November 1. At the present price of 96 the yield is £4 5s. per cent. In order to prevent misunderstanding on the yield question perhaps I had better explain once more the method of quoting Yankee bonds. Dealings in American bonds are carried on in London upon the basis of the dollar being worth 4s., and the quotation appears in dollars per cent. Thus, a buyer of a $500 bond quoted at 100, while he would pay £100 sterling would receive a bond of a face value of $500, whose actual worth would be, not £100, but approximately £103, the dollar having an exchange value of about 4s. 1½d. Consequently the yield upon a 4 per cent. bond quoted at 100 instead of being 4 per cent. would be about £4 3s. This method does not apply to American shares which while dealt in on the basis of 4s. to the dollar are converted to parity and dealt in at so much per share.

Baltimore and Ohio (Pittsburg, Lake Erie, and West Virginia) 4 per cent. bonds of the face value of $1,000 are a special mortgage on 1,634 miles of road, bonds being a direct obligation of the Baltimore and Ohio Company. The security is thus absolute. The bonds are redeemable at the option of the company at par on November 1, 1925, or any interest date thereafter on three months' notice, and in any case are to be paid off in 1941. Interest is payable May 1 and November 1. The present price is 95-97, and the yield accordingly is £4 5s. per cent. Norfolk and Western 4 per cent. divisional first lien and general mortgage $1,000 bonds stand at 94-97, and accordingly yield 4¼ per cent. The amount outstanding is $23,000,000, part of an authorised issue of $35,000,000, and the security is a first lien on extensions and branches aggregating 220 miles that are not covered by the first consolidated mortgage, and a lien on other properties subject to existing mortgages. The Norfolk is one of the most prosperous and progressive coaler railroads in the United States. Interest on the bonds is payable January 1 and July 1, and the principal is to be repaid on July 1, 1944, with the option to the company of redeeming at 5 per cent. premium on any interest date after January 1, 1929. Another bond which at the present price of 84-86 returns about 4¼ per cent. is New York Central 3½ per cent. Lake Shore collateral. The bonds of $1,000 denomination were issued in exchange for the shares of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad, now a subsidiary of the New York Central. Interest is payable on February 1 and August 1, and the bonds fall due in 1998.

To the list of safe 4 per cent. bonds enumerated above I will add one more—namely, Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul 4 per cent. bonds of $1,000 that were offered in 1909, and now stand at 97-99. These bonds have interest payable on January 1 and July 1, and are repayable at par in 1934. The Milwaukee has enjoyed a remarkable run of prosperity, having paid 7 per cent. dividends on its capital stock without a break since 1892, and the company possesses good scope for development in connection with its Pacific Coast extensions. A bond of semi-speculative type, but which is not over valued, is Erie 4 per cent. prior lien. The Erie has had a struggling career; in 1908 it narrowly escaped receivership, but since then the road has been doing considerably better, and is now showing a fair margin over fixed charges. Even assuming at the worst that the finances of the road may have to be overhauled before the company is on a permanently sound basis, it is unlikely that the position of the prior lien holders would be affected. The prior liens of a face value of $1,000 have interest payable January 1 and July 1 and the principal repayable in 1996. At the current price of 88-91 the yield is a little over 4½ per cent.

Large Buying of Canadas—B.A. and Pacific Dividend—Cuban Rails and the Cyclone.

Canadian Pacifics, in company with Yankees, have been a strong market during the week. Large buying orders were executed on behalf of Montreal, and the market continued to talk about the coming increase in the bonus from land profits. It is known, however, that up to the present the board has not met to consider the matter, and it is unlikely that any division will be come to, or at any rate made public, until the end of the year. The Buenos Ayres and Pacific Railway has announced its final dividend at the rate of 3 per cent., making 3 per cent. for the year ended June 30 last. The carry forward is £56,200, against £12,200. Some people in the market were disappointed with the result. On the face of it a dividend of 3 per cent. against 5 per cent. for the previous year and 7 per cent. two years ago is not satisfactory, but those who had followed the recent history of the company will hardly be surprised that the dividend is not more. In the best interests of the company there is no doubt that the board was well advised not to attempt paying a higher rate. In recent remarks upon the B.A. and Pacific I have more than once pointed out to shareholders that a 3 per cent. dividend earned would be better than a higher rate paid but only partly earned. A year ago, it may be recalled, 5 per cent. was distributed and not more than about 2 per cent. earned. It will be possible to speak more definitely on the point when I have had an opportunity to examine the accounts.

Cuban Rails have been agitated by the news of a disastrous cyclone which swept over the island, causing the loss of many lives and involving serious damage to real property and the crops. Full details are not yet to hand concerning the damage, but it unfortunately appears to be a fact that the tobacco crop, which previously looked like turning out badly, has been severely affected, and a certain amount of damage done to the sugar crop in the United of Havana's district and elsewhere. The territory served by the Cuban Central seems to have practically escaped harm. What with disasters from drought and disasters from hurricanes, the lot of the Cuban planters is not an altogether happy one. Such conditions should be a reminder to the public not to buy the stocks of the railways unless they show substantial yields—sufficient to make a fair average return likely. The Cuban Central, whose report came out the other day, is paying a dividend of 2 per cent. for the year ended June 30, as against nil for the previous twelve months. The rate is in accordance with my forecast of September 7. The company's £10 ordinary shares stand at 4¼, and they accordingly give a yield of less than 4¾ per cent. It will therefore require better results than those shown to justify the existing quotations.

RUBBER.

Marking Time—Ledbury—The Kamna Report.

Some slackening off in business is reported by brokers in the rubber share market, but values during the week have been fairly well maintained. The trouble which still appears to exist in Shanghai has had the effect of stopping buying orders from that quarter, but so far as can be ascertained the dumping of shares on this market has ceased. At last week's sales plantation rubber marked an average increase of 7d. per lb., and forward sales of a further 62½ tons for 1911 delivery at 6s. 5d. per lb. show that manufacturers are not slow to realise that the low prices now prevailing are the result only of temporarily diminished trade consumption. The October receipts at Para up to the 20th inst. amount to 1,995 tons, as against 3,270 tons for the whole of October, 1909, and dealers do not look for any important increase in this season's output from Brazil.

Recent market movements have upon the whole been rather in favour of the cheaper shares. A month ago Linggis were quoted 50s. 6d., and, after dipping to 40s., have recovered to 44s. 6d., at which price prospects are by no means over-discounted. Anglo-Malays have shown less change, but Malaccas have been weak at 7 on sales from Paris. Bukit Mertajams, which I recommended to my readers last month at 2s. 9d., are now quoted at 4s., and Glen Bervies within the same period have advanced from a premium of 1⅞ to 2¼. Taipings, too, are up from 2s. 4½d. to 2s. 9d., at which price they still appear to be a very good purchase, and Tremelbyes have moved from 5⅞ to 6. The market, of course, at present offers very little opportunity for the speculator in search of a quick turn, but the slump in values has left a wide field open to the investor who is satisfied with a 10 per cent. return, or who is prepared to lock up shares with a view to future capital appreciation. Northumberland Tea and Rubbers, now at a trifle over par, seem likely to come in for a share of activity. The first shipments of rubber and tea, consisting of 1,535 lbs. of rubber and 30,082 lbs. of tea, have been received, and further shipments are on the way. As I led my readers to expect, the yield is in excess of the prospectus estimate. Kinta Kellas show a steadily improving monthly output.

Ledbury is a very fair property, and has the advantage of Lanadron management, under which it is making excellent progress. Last year's dividend of 17½ per cent. may perhaps be doubled on the results for the current year, and it may perhaps be of interest to apply to Ledbury the valuation scale which I used for Tremelbye last week:—

LEDBURY.

| Acres. | Age of Rubber. | Valuation per acre. £ s. d. | Total. £ |

| | Working capital | | 41,000 |
| | Divide by number of shares, 110,000 | | £451,033 |
| | Value of share, say | | £4 0 0 |

Allowance has been made in the amount shown as working capital for the calls not yet due, and for the shares under option. Rubber valuation, of course, is not a mere matter of figures only, and although Ledbury was an old coffee property I should, in view of the excellence of its management, not regard the shares as over-valued at 3 premium.

The Venture group has been quiet of late, but Crudes should deserve some activity following the opening of the new works. These have been designed on model lines, and shareholders should make a point of inspecting their property when the demonstration is held. Mr. Guiguet has, I hear, visited the Madagascar property, and has ordered an improved type of boiler for the extracting machine, which should increase its efficiency. No difficulty of any serious character has occurred, and at an early date the company's shipments of rubber should be largely increased. Preparations on Nyassa have been actively pushed forward with a view to rapid development in the early part of next year.

The report issued by Mr. Lillingston on Kamna does little to clear up the mystery which surrounds this extraordinary company. It was floated, as my readers will remember, in March last with a board which included Mr. M. S. Parry of the Kuala Lumpur Company, and other well-known rubber directors. Influenced largely by the acknowledged standing of the members of the board applicants for shares felt entitled to rely upon the statements contained in the prospectus. It soon, however, became evident that the output estimate for 1910 was not being realised, and disclosures made in the Courts in the course of some legal proceedings with which the company was not directly connected, created some alarm among investors as to the value of their property and the history of its flotation. The directors thereupon sent an independent expert to the property. In the report now issued Mr. Lillingston practically confirms Mr. Hogg Robertson's report as to the extent of the property, the number of trees, and the excellent condition of the estate. The only difficulty, Mr. Lillingston states, is that created by the great scarcity of labour, and it will, he estimates, take eighteen months to procure a sufficient supply of labourers. In concluding his lengthy report Mr. Lillingston remarks:—

In my instructions I have been requested to give my candid criticisms on Mr. T. Hogg Robertson's report. I have carefully considered this somewhat delicate matter, and have come to the conclusion that there are three points regarding which I am at variance with Mr. Hogg Robertson's ideas, viz.: (1) Labour. (2) Estimated profits. (3) Valuation.

(1) Labour.—I cannot, of course, say what number of labourers were on the estate when Mr. Hogg Robertson visited it in January last, but I can quite well understand how that number may have been there, and have been largely diminished between the time when he inspected the property in January and took over the management towards the end of April following. After a contract of sale to your company had been completed, and before your own manager was on the spot, there would probably be no one at hand with a sufficient interest to maintain the labour force at its old standard, and, looking at the character of the natives and the demand for their services, it is quite obvious that shrinkage was natural.

(2) Estimated Profits.—My estimates, both of production and profits, differ materially from Mr. Hogg Robertson's. Such varying elements enter into these estimates that it is impossible to make comparisons. I have taken different yields of rubber, different prices, and different costs of production, but I do not consider that Mr. Hogg Robertson's estimates, made at the time they were, and under his then beliefs as to labour and market prices, were other than reasonable. It should be kept in mind that I am reporting about nine months later than Mr. Hogg Robertson.

(3) Valuation.—This naturally follows on my remarks under the previous heading, and if I had valued the property when Mr. Hogg Robertson did I should probably have valued it at more than he did. In conclusion, I can assure you that the Kamna property is in excellent condition, and is being well managed, and directly a sufficient labour force has been secured will give excellent yields.

The critical and deprecatory tone of the remarks which I have italicised, the fact that labour on the estate is now scarcer than ever, and that rubber has suffered a serious drop in price, all prepare the reader, if the words have any meaning at all, for a reduction of Mr. Hogg Robertson's valuation, and it is surprising to find that Mr. Lillingston values the property at £135,143, as against Mr. Robertson's £80,000. Mr. Lillingston's reasoning, I am afraid, does not agree with his arithmetic, and his report discloses no ground for the writing up of the valuation to something approaching, if indeed it does not exceed, £140 per planted acre.

A Mr. Hilckes stated at the shareholders' meeting—and his solicitors repeated the statement in a communication to the press—that the Kamna estate was purchased from German proprietors in February, 1910, for £7,500. Mr. John S. Low, according to a report of the proceedings in the courts, valued the property at about the same time at £7,750. Mr. Hogg Robertson put it down for prospectus purposes at £80,000, and now a few months later Mr. Lillingston values it at £135,143. In the absence of further information I cannot help feeling that Mr. Lillingston's report is far too optimistic to be satisfactory, and shareholders, I think, might reasonably ask the directors to call a meeting of the company at which the matter might be fully discussed.

MINES.

Some Improvement in Business Conditions—The Jumpers-Treasury Arrangement—Consolidated Mines Selection—Naraguta's First Dividend—Waihi Dividend Prospects.

Business in the mining markets improved a little last week, and had it not been for the restricting influence exercised by the advance in the Bank rate prices would probably have made a better showing. As it was, professionals thought it advisable to secure part, at any rate, of the profits showing on their deals, but insiders again accorded some support, and this prevented quotations from going back very far. At one time Kaffirs took the lead, Modders being in chief favour in this market, but Rhodesians subsequently came in for the larger share of attention, thanks not a little to the stimulus afforded by "shop" buying. Copper shares have been attracting a fair amount of speculative interest, but apart from one or two specialities the other mining groups have shown little activity. A cheerful feeling, however, generally prevails as regards the prospect of some further improvement in business in the account which has just commenced.

Complaints have been made recently on the score that the issue of official statements by certain Rand companies was anticipated by movements in their shares, which were evidently the result of prior knowledge by some operator or operators. It is not always possible to prevent information leaking out, but directors should do their best to give their shareholders information at the earliest possible moment. In last week's issue I referred to the delay on the part of the City Deep management in publishing a statement as to the probable date of the commencement of crushing, but there has since come under notice a case which appears to call for stronger comment. I refer to the news of the Jumpers and Treasury Companies having come to an arrangement for the joint working of their mines. On the 4th inst. the Johannesburg correspondent of the Financial Times cabled some details of the agreement, and his message appeared in that paper the following day. Nothing more was heard of the matter until the 21st inst., on which day the London secretary of the Jumpers sent out to the shareholders a circular giving them information, "received by cablegram from Johannesburg," as to the agreement. Not only was the Jumpers Company forestalled by more than a fortnight, but when it did notify its shareholders it actually gave them less information regarding the terms of arrangement than was contained in the newspaper correspondent's cable! The documents sent out by the Treasury Company contained more details, but were also more than a fortnight behind the cable. It would be interesting to know exactly when the provisional agreement was fixed up by the directors of the two companies, especially as on the 3rd inst. there was a spurt in the market price of Jumpers shares.

The Jumpers and Treasury mines adjoin, and both are "short-lived" propositions, the greater part of their ore having been extracted. Under the arrangement made for joint working, the Jumpers is to take over the management of the Treasury mine and works, and is to purchase twenty of the Treasury's stamps with all appurtenances at a valuation. Two-thirds of the net profits earned are to go to the Jumpers, but this company is to set aside out of its share of the profits a sum of £400 a month until the Treasury profits amount to £53,500. If no profits are made on the joint working the Treasury will be entitled to terminate the agreement on giving one month's notice; otherwise the agreement will remain in force until both mines are completely worked out. The Jumpers' earnings have been on the basis of £5,000 a month for some time past, and the Treasury has been making rather more than £2,000 a month. With joint working of the mines the ratio of working expenses should be reduced.

The report just issued to the shareholders of the Consolidated Mines Selection Company covers the thirteenth financial year of the undertaking, and makes a disappointing showing. The improvement in the position disclosed by the 1908-9 accounts gave rise to hopes of a resumption of dividends the following year, but the 1909-10 figures record a relapse instead of further improvement. The directors state that new business during the past financial year enabled them to materially add to the undistributed profit-balance, but against this has to be placed a considerable increase in the depreciation on holdings, "due to a long-continued spell of depression in the mining markets not generally expected, and, on the whole, not justified, looking at the conditions of the industry." The profit and loss account for the year ended June 30 last shows a credit balance of £64,527 as compared with £99,296 for the preceding period, while the excess of cash and cash assets over current liabilities is stated to be £277,489, as against £414,510 twelve months ago. The Consolidated Mines Selection is largely interested in the Brakpan, which is rapidly nearing the producing stage, and its other interests include a participation in the West African Mines Selection Syndicate, which has acquired a substantial shareholding in the Wallis Company.

Although the market in Nigerian shares has been quiet for some weeks past there has been no lack of activity in connection with the industry itself. Numerous expeditions are in or are on their way to the tin field for the purpose of selecting properties, and new companies are being formed, while those concerns that have already been in existence some time have not been letting the grass grow under their feet. The Naraguta, the most advanced in the matter of production, has followed up its announcement as to the acquisition of additional property by the declaration of a first interim dividend of 5 per cent., to be paid out of profits already derived from tin won by hand labour. Other members of the group are understood to be producing on a small scale, but they do not issue regular statements, like the Naraguta. Why not? Shareholders are entitled to know what is going on.

Elsewhere in this issue will be found particulars of two new Nigerian tin propositions, the Bisichi Tin Company and the Gel Tin Lode and Alluvial Company. Mr. H. W. Laws, the mining manager of the Niger Company, has reported favourably on the alluvial areas of both concerns.

When it was announced by the Waihi directors at the beginning of September that the four-weekly returns of the mine "will probably come down to about £68,000 before the end of the year," I pointed out that this would necessitate a reduction in the distributions, and suggested that the annual rate would be lowered from 18s. to 16s. per share, that is, by the amount of the bonus declared for 1909. This, it now transpires, is also the official view, as will be gathered from the following extract from a circular issued by the secretary at the end of last week:—

> In consequence of the values on the 9th Level having up to the present proved on the whole inferior to the values on the 7th and 8th Levels, the average grade of the ore crushed will be lower than it has been up to the middle of this year. After careful consideration of the position and the values of the existing ore reserves, it has been estimated that a four-weekly return of about £68,000 should be obtained if the developments do not become worse. If the above average is maintained, the directors expect to be able to continue the quarterly dividend of 4s. per share, though, for the present, no bonus must be anticipated.

The last return from the mine, for the period ended October 1, was £68,744, as compared with yields of £74,000 earlier in the year.

Simmer's Results and Prospects.

Twelve months ago I prepared my readers for a falling off in the Simmer and Jack Proprietary Mines' rate of dividend, and the report just issued to shareholders on this side shows that the company did not do nearly so well in the financial year ended June 30 last as in the preceding period. The results for the last two years are summarised below:—

| | 1909–10. | 1908–9. |
|---|---|---|
| Ore crushed (tons) | 821,400 | 831,040 |
| Yield per ton | 25/3 | 29/9 |
| Cost per ton | 12/9 | 13/– |
| Profit per ton | 12/6 | 16/9 |
| | £ | £ |
| Gross receipts | 1,109,658 | 1,256,795 |
| Expenses, taxes, etc. | 570,856 | 602,028 |
| Net profit | 538,802 | 654,767 |
| Dividends | 525,000 | 675,000 |
| Rate per cent. | 17½ | 22½ |

The financial year 1908-9 was a record one in the company's history as regards the tonnage treated, net profit earned, and the amount distributed to shareholders. It will be noticed, however, that the dividends and bonus amounting in all to 22½ per cent. absorbed about £20,000 more than was actually earned during the period.

The falling off in earnings which has since occurred is attributable mainly to labour shortage. This difficulty began to be felt about the beginning of the financial year under review, and was subsequently accentuated. In consequence, the use of machine drills had to be extended, and this adversely affected the grade of ore sent to the mill, while in addition an increased amount of low grade material, not formerly included in the payable ore reserves, was mined. Moreover, the alterations to plant necessitated the hanging-up of twenty stamps at a time, and the quantity of ore milled was therefore smaller. It is a satisfactory feature that despite the difficulties mentioned the Simmer was able to keep down its average costs, but for which, of course, the reduction in profits would have been still more marked. The past year's dividend total of 17½ per cent. is the smallest distribution made by the Simmer since the 10 per cent. paid for 1906-7. For 1908-9 the distributions amounted to 20 per cent.

On the basis of the past year's distributions the yield on Simmer and Jack shares at the current price of 1½ works out at nearly 12 per cent. This makes them appear cheap, leaving the question of the remaining life of the mine out of consideration, and if I were a holder I should be inclined to retain my interest for the present at any rate. My reasons for this view are (1) that there does not seem much likelihood of a further reduction of the dividend rate in the current financial year, and (2) that Simmers are as likely as not to go to a somewhat better price when the Kaffir market becomes more lively. Apropos of the first reason, it is worthy of note that the chairman, at the meeting held at Johannesburg last month, said "There seems good reason to hope that the average profits for the current year will be up to the level of those obtained during the period under review." The alterations to plant were practically completed at the date of the meeting, and a gradual increase in the monthly tonnage should at least compensate for a possible further reduction in the average grade.

The Gold Fields Dividend Problem.

The results obtained by the Simmer and Jack, which are reviewed above, have a bearing upon a question of considerable market interest at this time of year—namely, the amount of the Consolidated Gold Fields' dividend. The Gold Fields, it may be remembered, is a large holder of Simmer and Jack shares, and to not a small extent the amount of its own dividend depends upon the total sum the company receives by way of dividend income on its various shareholdings. In course of the next week or two the Gold Fields is due to declare its balance distribution for the financial year ended June 30 last, and market men are already exercising their minds over the problem as to what the amount will be. For 1908-9 the company distributed 7s. per share, and on account of 1909-10 a dividend of 2s. per share has already been paid. It is not expected that the balance distribution will be more than 5s. per share (the amount declared twelve months ago); the question is, Will it be less?

Although the company is believed to have done well out of its Rhodesian interests, the probability is that the Gold Fields' total earnings for the last financial year were less than for 1908-9, which was an exceptionally good year. Reduced earnings, however, do not necessarily mean a smaller distribution. In this connection it may be recalled that out of its available balance of well over a million sterling the company a year ago allocated £500,000 for writing down its shares in crushing mines. The distribution of 35 per cent. on the ordinary shares for 1908-9, therefore, did not amount to a division of profits up to the hilt. The allocation referred to was made because the company had had an exceptionally good year, having made "large abnormal profits" out of share transactions, and Lord Harris at the meeting last November told the shareholders that they must not expect much out of such receipts:—

> We do not think you ought, now that you can expect a good dividend from normal receipts, to expect much from the abnormal receipts, for these, of course, are the results of the sales of shares, and ought to be reinvested for the purpose of insurance and the production of the normal receipts. I cannot speak with certainty, but it seems to us that the average normal receipts—i.e., receipts, from dividends, interest and underwriting during the next five years—we have not looked beyond that—ought certainly not to drop below and are more likely to exceed that of this year [1908-9] after making allowance for the temporary set-back in our big crushing mines, which we must put up with the next twelve months.

For 1908-9 the normal receipts amounted to nearly £800,000, a sum which covered the preference dividend for the year, stamp duty and the ordinary dividends amounting to 7s. per share. It is not possible to say what the normal receipts amounted to in the past financial year, but assuming that they were not much less than those of the preceding period, maintenance of the ordinary dividend at the 1908-9 rate would seem probable.

INDUSTRIALS.

Some Cheap Purchases—Hurst Nelson Preference—Carlton Hotel Issues—Companies' Results Reviewed—Chinese Engineering and Mining—Possible Expropriation by the Chinese Government.

A speculative investment yielding 6½ per cent. that is worth looking at is the 6 per cent. cumulative £10 preference shares of Hurst Nelson and Company, Limited. These shares stand at 9-9½, with 6s. to come off November 11. The company's business is that of builders of railway and tramway carriages, wagons, and rolling stock of every description, iron and brass founders, etc., and since the foundation in 1880 an important connection has been got together with companies at home and abroad. There are works at Motherwell, Chesterfield, and Bridgend, besides fifty repairing depôts throughout the United Kingdom. The £200,000 preference shares are a first charge on the property, for no debentures and no additional preference shares ranking pari passu with the existing preference shares can be issued without the consent of the holders of at least three-fourths of the preference shares. The present company took over the business as from February, 1909, nothing being charged for goodwill. The average annual profits for the three years ended July, 1908, were £41,173. In each of the two succeeding years they have been about £33,000, the falling off being due partly to less active trade and partly to the action of the railway companies regarding the supply of wagons to private owners in Scotland. The dispute over this matter has now been settled, the railway company against whom proceedings were brought having admitted its obligations and agreed to pay damages. The outlook, therefore, points to better results in the current year. Taking, however, the results as they stand for the year ended July 16 last, the trading profit was £32,897, of which £2,633 went in income tax and interest, £13,606 in depreciation, and £1,200 in writing off a further portion of the expenses incidental to the formation of the company. There was thus left to cover the preference interest (£12,000) a sum of £15,458, to which may be added the balance of £6,170 brought in. The margin behind the preference interest is not at present enough to make the shares a safe investment, but I regard them as a very fair 6½ per cent. business risk. It is the intention of the company to set aside at least 10 per cent. of the profits left after paying the preference interest, that is before paying dividend on the ordinary shares (which were taken by the vendors) in order eventually to establish a preference reserve fund of £36,000, equal to three years' interest.

The Chinese Engineering and Mining Company, whose shares I have several times recommended, continues to prosper. Despite unfavourable conditions in the coal trade of China, the gross profit for the twelve months ended February last worked out at £243,300, or within a few hundreds of the previous year's total. The effect of lower selling prices was counterbalanced by an increase of 86,800 tons in coal sold. Thus the board was able to repeat the dividend of 15 per cent. Chief interest in the report attaches to its reference to the negotiations between the company and the Chinese Government over matters long in dispute. One mode of settlement that was proposed by the authorities was the purchase of the property in exchange for Chinese Government bonds, and, although the shareholders have no terms yet put before them, the board is conferring with the authorities and has the benefit of assistance from the British Government. Pending a tangible offer, I think shareholders would be wise to retain their shares. The property is a valuable one, and the present market capitalisation is distinctly moderate; therefore if the Chinese authorities wish to obtain possession of it they ought to give a price that works out at something over and above the present figure.

Hotel companies have not been doing so well of late that I can allow the results declared by the Carlton to pass without a word of comment. The company is paying a balance dividend which brings the total for the year up to 7 per cent., as compared with 6 per cent. for 1908-9, besides which it is putting £10,000 to general reserve, against £5,000, and is maintaining the usual appropriations. The Carlton Hotel for each of the six years ending 1906-7 paid ordinary dividends of 10 per cent.; then came the drop to 5 per cent., followed by a recovery first to 6 and now to 7 per cent. The patient is thus looking quite convalescent, and the fact has an important bearing upon the advisability or otherwise of purchasing its securities. The 4½ per cent. mortgage debenture stock, secured by a first charge upon the Ritz Hotel and by a second charge on the properties originally acquired by the Carlton Hotel, stands at 85-90, and accordingly offers a yield of 5 per cent. It may be redeemed at 105 after January, 1915. Interest and sinking fund require £16,000, and profits at present cover this amount three and a-half times. The company's 5½ per cent. cumulative preference shares of £10 stand at 6¾-7¼, and accordingly show a return of 7½ per cent. As their interest is covered nearly four times, they look cheap. The £1 ordinary quoted at 11-16 to 13-16 offer a return of 8⅝ per cent., so that they are by no means extravagantly valued.

Hope Brothers, Limited, the hosiers, are paying 5½ per cent. for the year, against 5 per cent., the net profits being nearly £2,000 higher at £37,200. The Aerated Bread Company has not so far shown any very satisfactory outcome of the recent shareholders' agitation. The balance dividend works out at 12½ per cent., as against 15 per cent., and makes the total distribution for the year 25 against 27½ per cent. The present distribution is the lowest for eleven years.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

The Charing Cross Bank.

It is now evident that the failure of the Charing Cross Bank will cause more widespread loss and suffering than any financial disaster of the kind since the Liberator crash. According to the preliminary statement which the Senior Official Receiver has issued, the liabilities reach the colossal sum of £2,500,000 and the number of creditors—mostly depositors in the so-called bank—is about 25,000. This statement, as the Official Receiver carefully explains, is based entirely upon figures supplied by Mr. Carpenter, the sole proprietor of the bank. So far as the liabilities are concerned we may assume that it is approximately correct; but the debtor's estimates of the value of his assets must be received, as every business man will recognise, with the most extreme caution. There is cash to the amount of £133,000 and various easily realisable securities may produce another £50,000 or £60,000. Book debts are put down at £60,000, and freehold and leasehold properties at £24,000. For the rest the main item is the debtor's investment in the uncompleted Atlantic, Quebec, and Western Railway, in which he is said to have sunk no less than £1,250,000, of which only £300,000 is in the first mortgage debentures. The value of this asset is described as "doubtful," and I am afraid that at the best the creditors cannot hope to get back more than a very small proportion of the million and a-quarter which the debtor has recklessly poured into this enterprise. Even if every penny were recovered and the debtor's estimates of all his other assets were realised, there would still be a deficiency of nearly one million; but I fear that the deficiency is likely to turn out very much nearer two millions than one, so that the unfortunate creditors will probably never receive anything more than a small dividend. So far as Truth is concerned its readers were fully informed of the character and position of this bank by the articles which I published in 1907, and ever since correspondents who have asked my opinion about it have been warned to have nothing to do with it. An article dealing with the part the press generally has played in this lamentable business appears on another page.

Eatonesque.

A remarkable offer of shares is being circulated by E. T. Leaver, secretary of the Patent Block Tar, Motor Oil, and Asphalt Company Limited, 77, High Street, Newport, Mon. The owners of these shares, he says, are selling part of their holdings in order "to further financially assist the company until the completion of negotiations now pending to acquire the present company's interest, when each shareholder would receive about £2 in cash or shares for every £1 share now purchased." Meanwhile "the sellers guarantee interest on the shares at the rate of 10 per cent. for twelve months, payable in advance." The £1 shares are offered at par, you deduct 10 per cent. from that price, and thus you get in advance the interest so generously guaranteed by the sellers! For the benefit of anybody who is not sufficiently warned off by the rank absurdity of this proposition, I may add that the Patent Block Tar Company was one of the promotions of Mr. Edmund Eaton, whose name has become notorious in connection with a long series of undertakings, most of them trumpery little gas and water concerns, in which unfortunate investors have lost their money. The circular now being sent out only gives the names of two of the directors of the Patent Block Tar Company, Sir C. H. B. Soame, Bart., chairman, and Mr. H. W. L. Way, J.P., vice-chairman. Both these gentlemen and their colleagues on the board have been associated with other Eatonesque enterprises.

"A 1 Securities."

From Tower Chambers, Finsbury Pavement, E.C., H. Masters, of "The A 1 Securities Investment Agency, Stock and Share Dealers," has been issuing a circular headed "private," and ending with a request that it shall be treated as "entirely confidential." Obviously Masters has no sort of right to expect strangers to regard his circular (he calls it a letter) as private and confidential, and one or two of the recipients have passed it on to me. It opens with a curious statement. "I have been advised by my solicitors," he writes, "to approach you on the subject of a very favourable investment in a picture theatre company." He does not name the company, but gives a glowing account of it—"now earning very substantial profits, capable of great expansion," etc.—and winds up by saying that if you will tell him how much you are prepared to invest he could arrange an appointment to give you full details. It would certainly be interesting to have fuller details in reference to the statement about the solicitors, which seems to be a new departure in a circularising business of this kind. Meanwhile I venture to set a bit of financial advice against this legal advice. It is that picture theatre company securities should not be regarded as exactly "A 1 securities," and that very favourable investments are not usually hawked round in this manner.

"Banker's Margin."

When the bucket-shop harpy who calls himself Francis Ellis, 8, Union Court, E.C., first attracted my attention last June he was seeking to lure money from the unwary for his "progressive options" by the bold pretence that "whichever way the market goes you are bound to make a big profit." That bait has apparently been found to be a little too fly-blown—at any rate Ellis is now inviting a trial of "the method of dealing in Stock Exchange securities on banker's margin." He modestly observes that he is "not adducing the merit of novelty to the method" in question. I should think not. What he impudently describes as the "banker's margin" method is simply the old 1 per cent. cover-snatching game which has been worked for years by all the shadiest of the bucket-shops.

McKinley, Alexander, and Sons.

Mr. H. G. Starck, proprietor of the McKinley, Alexander, and Sons' bucket-shop, pleaded the Gaming Act in an action heard by Mr. Justice Channell on Saturday. The action was brought by one of the firm's clients to recover £157 due to him as a subscriber to those famous "Three Month Trusts" which were criticised in Truth some time ago. The defence was that these were gaming transactions ("bets" Mr. Starck's counsel called them), and that the money was therefore not recoverable. Holding that this was so, Mr. Justice Channell gave judgment for the defendant.

"Stocks and Shares."

In "The Meaning of Money" Mr. Hartley Withers, the City Editor of the Morning Post, produced a masterly treatise on our monetary system, and he has now written an equally good companion volume on the cognate subject of "Stocks and Shares" (Smith, Elder, and Co.). Successful as its predecessor has been, passing through edition after edition, the new book will appeal to a much larger public. Its purpose is to tell the investor "something about marketable securities, what they are and what they mean, how they came into being, what are their most notable merits and defects, how and why they go up and down in price, and how much can fairly be expected from them." Of the lamentable ignorance which exists on these points, even among people who might reasonably be expected to know better, I get many proofs in the inquiries that are poured every week into my "Letter Box," and a work designed to enlighten the investor who desires to take an intelligent interest in his investments is a public boon. To all such investors I can thoroughly recommend Mr. Withers's volume. It costs 7s. 6d., but it will be money well laid out. Of course, the reader must not suppose that Mr. Withers will show him how to get rich quick. Quite a host of simple-minded folk nowadays seem to think they can accomplish that feat by gambling in stocks and shares, and—still more remarkable—many hug the delusion that they can somehow contrive to enjoy the chances of a gamble without running any of the risks. It is for the investor, not the gambler, that "Stocks and Shares" is intended, and, thanks to the author's happy gift of an agreeable literary style, it is an attractive as well as a sound and lucid exposition of its subject.

NEW ISSUE.

Applications are invited by Messrs. J. Henry Schröder and Co. for £1,200,000 five and a-half per cent. first mortgage debentures of the Lima Light, Power and Tramways Company at the price of £97 per cent. The company has recently been incorporated under the laws of Peru to take over and work five electric railway, tramway, water-power, and lighting undertakings, and the lease of the Lima Railway Company. The present issue is made to pay off bonds and loans amounting to about £970,000, and to provide for the extension and improvement of the undertakings. The amount required for interest and sinking fund is £88,898; the profits for 1909 were £153,470.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of TRUTH.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Anthrax.—The fall has been due to the proposed Australian land tax. The scheme was satisfactory enough. The bonds are necessarily of a speculative character, though as a lock-up they should be worth holding. Arranhill.—Dividends on Steels and Atchisons are paid quarterly, in March, June, September, and December. For several quarters past the rates have been 5 per cent. on the former and 6 per cent. on the latter. Union Pacific is in receipt of 10 per cent. dividends paid quarterly in January, April, July, and October.

Cestrian.—You might put the money into Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Four per Cent. Mortgage A bonds. I think the Home Railway stocks will recover to a further extent, but never counsel putting too many eggs into one basket.

Medico (Oxford).—The company has made good progress in the last few years, and its bonds would make a very fair investment.

Pip.—There is £7,207,600 Ordinary and £6,519,600 Deferred, to pay ½ per cent. (actual) on which therefore requires £68,636.

Snap.—Yes.

Worried.—Previous to 1891 Great Northern Ordinary was split into 6 per cent. B stock and A stock. Since 1891 the method has been to split the ordinary stock into 4 per cent. preferred and deferred, and the bulk of the stock is in this form. So long as the company can pay interest on the B and preferred stocks the dividends on the A and deferred will be alike. But should the company ever get into the sere and yellow and have to forgo paying interest on the B and preferred stocks, the A would be in a worse position than the deferred, because, the interest on the B being cumulative, there would be arrears of interest placed in front of the A, whereas, the interest on the preferred being non-cumulative, there would be no arrears put in front of the deferred.

Mines.

Arthur.—The shares appear to have fair lock-up chances at the present price.

De Wet.—1 and 2. Hold for another active market. 4. You could make a more promising selection. Dick.—Both may have some recovery when the market becomes more active, but they are not very promising holdings.

E. H. S.—1. A good holding for dividends. See article, "A Mining Investment" in Truth of September 28. 2. See Insurance. Exon.—In my opinion the money could be employed to better advantage elsewhere.

H. C. T. K.—You might take advantage of a rally to exchange into East Rand Proprietary.

Losanna.—1. Taking the new shares would be very much of a gamble. 2. Get your broker to sell them in the market. 3. About 3s. 4. See note in last week's issue regarding City Deep. The Randfontein Central is also expected to start crushing about the end of the year. 5. Possibly a small distribution may be announced.

Needles.—I do not recommend either.

Ranger.—I regret I have no recent information as to the company's operations. A circular issued last March stated that a thorough examination of portions of the property was being made, but the result does not appear to have been announced.

Speculateur.—I consider that the shares have speculative possibilities, and would not sell at the present low price. S.W.—A circular was issued to the shareholders a few weeks ago foreshadowing a reduction in output pending the opening up of a larger quantity of ore.

Whitehall.—The company owns collieries in Natal, but little information is available as to its operations. Winnipeg.—I have not seen a quotation for the shares and have not sufficient information as to the concern to enable me to pass an opinion on the prospects of the shares.

Mixed Securities.

Alpha.—1. A call of 1s. was made recently, making the shares 7s. paid. Hold the shares as a speculation. 2. Might be held on the chance of some recovery when business becomes more brisk. Arva.—1. These might as well be sold. 2. Hold in hope of a recovery. 3. Hopeful as a lock-up.

Bamboo.—1. Government Stock and Other Securities Investment 4 per cent. perpetual debenture stock is a safe investment that would meet your requirements. 2. Further purchases of a and b should turn out well in time. As to d, there are the disappointments in connection with neighbouring properties to take into account. Bim.—1. The company referred to was the Transvaal G.M. Estate. 2. In matters of banking one cannot be too conservative. I should prefer one of the old-established joint stock banks to either of the institutions you name. 3. In course of time some recovery is probable. Bix.—1. The debentures are a good investment, and the preference a hopeful speculation. 2. Not advised. 3. A fair speculation for a moderate profit.

C. W. P.—All three fair industrials, but if safety be your primary object I would suggest instead dividing between London, Chatham, and Dover Railway 3½ per cent. debenture stock and Union Pacific Railroad 4 per cent. 1st lien and refunding 4 per cent. bonds. You need not split up £1,000 into more than two such good securities. Spreading one's capital is a sound rule, but when the stocks selected have unquestioned security there is no need to chop up, say, £1,000 into five or ten portions. You are giving yourself needless trouble and incurring needless expense through the multiplication of fees and commissions. Cave.—Three excellent stocks.

France.—1. Better not buy now, even though the shares may possibly go up further to a moderate extent. 2. There is a quotation, but the shares are not an active market. 3. As a lock-up they are a hopeful speculation.

Hibernicus.—1. There is room for a further moderate rise. 2. The company is known to be doing very well, but the present price discounts a great deal. They are worth keeping as an investment, but I should not buy now for a rise. 3. Market at present too disturbed to make purchase desirable.

Investor.—1. Many things may occur between now and 1913. I can only say that the railway is a splendid property and ably managed, and that the new shares look a solid investment. Obviously, with ordinary stocks, it is well to remember the adage about not putting too many eggs in one basket. 2. I think a further purchase would turn out well in time. Iramore.—Keep the Railway stock as an investment, and hold the Mining shares for a better market.

Junius.—An interim dividend was paid in April, and the final dividend at the rate of 7 per cent., making 6 per cent. for the whole year, has just been declared, and will be paid immediately. 2. A somewhat speculative holding, but I see no reason to advise an immediate sale.

Pen.—1. The preference seem a fair business risk at present price. 2. Very much of a gamble. c. Fair holding for a moderate profit.

Somerset.—1. The immediate dividend outlook is a trifle uncertain, but the company is a very strong one, and possesses good scope for development. Keep what you have. 2. The preference shares are well worth applying for. They are practically a safe investment. 3. Reputable members of the Stock Exchange. Seeker.—The security for 2 and 3 ranks very high. Sorry, but I do not know No. 1, and therefore cannot offer any opinion. As other suitable investments I would suggest New York Telephone 4½ per cent. bonds, India Government 3 per cent. stock, New York Corporate 4½ per cent. stock, Rand Water Board Fours, English Sewing Cotton 4 per cent. 1st debenture stock, Dalgety 4 per cent. irredeemable debenture stock, Merchants' Trust 4 per cent. debenture stock, and, say, a couple of the American Railroad bonds referred to in an article this week. Septimus.—A recovery is not unlikely later on, and meanwhile you have a first-class investment. I should hold. Sronos.—1. Fanti Mines might suit your purpose. 2. Taiping, Glen Bervie. 3. Your money could be more hopefully employed than in the shares of this concern. Strongman.—1. I do not know it. 2. They are strangers to me, and you ought not to act on their suggestions without the fullest and strictest investigations from independent sources. 3. A dividend has just been declared.

I see no reason at present to expect much rise in the shares. 4 and 5. See rules.

The Imp.—1. The company appears to be in a financial mess, and it is impossible to say at present how things are likely to go. If you cannot afford to risk further loss better sell. I do not regard either of your railway selections as a desirable holding. Tip.—Neither is, in my opinion, an attractive investment, and you might sell. For safe investments see reply to "Seeker." Trustful.—There is not much market in shares of the class, and without knowing how prices go I cannot advise. There is, however, probably something in what you say about prospects of the well-managed concerns, and you might see if your broker can make any recommendation.

Wykehamist.—1. There would appear to be a fair chance of some further improvement. 2. Hold for the present. 3. There is very keen competition in this class of business, and you must be prepared as a holder to take the big risk that attaches to a new venture of the kind.

Rubber.

Ace.—Hold them all. Dividend dates not yet fixed, but Kinta Kellas output is in excess of estimate, and the others are, I believe, now tapping. Anthrax.—1. See Rubber Notes. 2. In good hands, and worth holding for a gradual improvement, but instead of averaging buy Taiping. Abel.—1. Mabira is a sound wild rubber company. Alteration unimportant. Hold both at present, but on any substantial rise in Anglo-Malay I should exchange for a cheaper share. 2. A good speculative purchase. Atelectasis.—Taiping and Merlimau. Bukit Mertajam is not too high, but it has risen from 2s. 9d. to 4s. since I recommended it last month. Aar.—1. In good hands, but development will be slow. I prefer Taiping at about the same price, and you might exchange. 2. Extension work is taking place on Siak with a view to subsidiary flotation. Hold. 3. Sound company with a strong board. I should not sell at a discount. Ajax (Llangollen).—1 and 2. Take a profit at your figure. 3. See first reply to "Aar." Apos.—Hold No. 1 for improvement, but instead of averaging, buy Taiping or Gula Kalumpong for capital appreciation. Alpha I.—Soconusco is the company to which you refer. I prefer Taiping. 2. Take a profit when you see one. 3. Quite sound. Look for steady appreciation. Amateur Two.—No. Reply referred to "Dangan," as printed. In your new list average No. 1. No. 5 is worth holding. Sell the others at favourable opportunity. Ajax (Hull).—A good share. Now tapping, and should earn a dividend next year. Try Taiping. Argod.—1. Now tapping. Look for steady improvement. 2. Should earn a dividend in 1912.

Beechy.—All worth holding, and as a speculation you might increase your holding of Nos. 1 and 3. Box.—Hold both for improvement. Bell Hill.—1. Quite sound, but acreage valuation is high. Sell when you can do so at a profit. 2. Malang prospectus estimates were too high. Sell at favourable opportunity. 3. Speculative, but worth holding at present price. Balu.—Hold Nos. 1 and 2 for an improvement. As to No. 3, see first reply to "Anthrax." B.A.B.—Tremelbye and Langkat Sumatra. Brookside.—Hold both for steady improvement. Bustard.—1. See first reply to "Bell Hill." 2. Worth holding. 3. Sell on an improvement. Brown.—1. Hold for improvement. 2. Good estate. Worth buying at present price, but prospectus estimate for 1910 is not likely to be realised, and former price was too high. 3. Good speculative holding. Bhoy.—Yes. Northumberland should suit you. The other will not pay a dividend before 1912. Bowdon.—Hold Nos. 1 and 3. As to No. 2, see first reply to "Aar." Bedford.—1. I do not like the district. 2. Sell when you can. 3. Taiping.

Cyclops.—Described in these columns on flotation as overcapitalised. Very speculative, but hardly worth selling at present price. Crank.—Nos. 1 and 2 are worth holding. Watch for an opportunity to sell No. 3. Coleherne.—1. Taiping, Langkat Sumatra, and Jeram. 2. Both worth averaging. 3. Look for reply next week.

Doubtful.—All are sound and worth holding.

E. I.—Hold by all means. Etak.—No dividend yet paid, but Kinta Kellas is now tapping, and the others should pay a dividend next year. E. H. S.—Quite sound, and will pay handsome dividends, but when you see a good profit exchange for a cheaper share. East.—The Crude Company is making a large and highly profitable business, and I have not altered my opinion as to its soundness, but change in market conditions rendered withdrawal of limit necessary. Wait for demonstration to shareholders and then write again.

Flick.—Hold Malacca. As to the other, see first reply to "Aar." Taiping or Merliman. Nilambur tapping should commence in 1912. Fogg.—The company apparently went to allotment on the minimum subscription, and the shares are unmarketable. Not promising. Frage.—An excellent list. Nos. 1 and 4 for dividends. The others for capital appreciation. Add Taiping to the list.

Haversham.—Hold both for substantial recovery. Buy Taiping and Langkat Sumatra. Hayseed.—1. Yes. 2. Yes. 3. Average both. Hawthorne.—Look for steady improvement in them all. Later you might sell No. 1. As to No. 5, see first reply to "Aar." Haverklip. Sell as you suggest. Hibernicus.—1. I have had an excellent private report on Highlands recently. Average as you suggest. 2. See first reply to "Yam." 1,100 acres planted. 10,000 trees four and a half years old. 3. My figures for Taiping are correct. 915,000 shares (2s.) issued to public. 1,035,000 vendors shares had not been issued at date of statutory report. 150,000 shares unissued, but subject to option. A good purchase.

India.—Yes. One of the re-forming companies of which there are several, but there is no market in the shares, and I cannot recommend a purchase. Jonah.—1. One of the soundest. Market conditions only cause of fall. 2. I agree; but you might hold for 50s. 3. Worth holding for the present. Jinkee.—I shall deal with the Sumatra group later. J. B. Styring.—Ledbury, Gula-Kalumpong, Taiping.

Keys.—1. Fully worth present price. But you might buy a lower-priced share. Taiping. 2. Now tapping, and should soon pay a dividend. 3. Should develop well next year. Kilkenny.—1. Taiping, Merlimau, Bukit Mertajam. 2. Alor Pongsu, Brieh, Jeram. 3. Both good. Kia Ora.—Both should tap end of next year. Both good. Kilt.—1, 2, and 3. Quoted at 3d. discount. Fair property. Worth holding for improvement. 4, 5, 6. Speculative. Not a good time for selling, but watch for an opportunity.

Lanes Park.—Hold Crudes. Taiping should suit you. Lukut.—1. Hold for 50s. 2. Not over-valued at present, but no immediate rise expected. Has not yet paid a dividend.

Mrs. Grundy.—1. In good hands, but it means a long wait. 2. Quite sound, but later I should exchange for a cheaper share. 3. Yes. Quite good. Moorland.—Table is correct as printed, and your figures are right for four-year-old rubber—i.e., rubber in its fifth year. Mott.—Yes. Northumberland. Musica.—All sound. Tandjong and Tebrau should turn out well. Mastung.—1. Yes; b is speculative, but at your price should turn out well. 2. I do not care to recommend a purchase on borrowed money. 3. Both should earn a dividend next year. 4. Dates not yet fixed.

Nosreap.—1. See first reply to "Aar." 2. Quite sound on a seven years' purchase basis. On any substantial improvement you might exchange for a cheaper share. Notap.—Yes. A sound company, but for the first few years profits depend largely on the tin deposits. Novice.—Yes. All sound.

Out.—Yes. All good. I prefer No. 3.

Park.—Well worth holding as an investment. Peter.—A very sound list. Hold them all. Pacificus.—See Rubber Notes. I should not average until labour position improves. Pen.—No. 1 as a speculation. The others are sound. I prefer No. 2. Pickworth.—The prospectus was unsatisfactory, and at best the venture is very speculative.

Quassia.—Hold them all for steady improvement.

R. G. D.—1. Klanang dividends, 15 per cent for 1908, 45 per cent. for 1909, half-yearly interim for 1910 33 1-3 per cent. 2. Mapalagama 2s. shares fully paid. Now quoted 1s. 9d. Robur.—See first reply to "Aar." Roddy.—1. Yes. Quite right. 2. Hold for your figure. Rubber Enquiry.—Both sound, and well worth holding. Rathgar.—Hold Nos. 1, 2, 5, and 6 for improvement. No. 4 should develop well next year. As to No. 3, see Rubber Notes.

Seestu.—I think you would do well to average now. Submersible.—Taiping would make a good exchange. Skerries.—1. Yes. Average as you suggest. 2 Quite good. Add Taiping to your list. Scarborough.—Hold for recovery. At present Taiping would be a better purchase. Swallow.—Nilambur is in good hands, but I am afraid development will be slow, and perhaps an exchange for Taiping would give quicker results. Hold the others. Shrapnel.—1 and 2. Hold for your figure. 3. Good speculative possibilities, but the Malayan companies are safer. Strathmore.—Many thanks for enclosure. Curiously enough, I am awaiting a private report from the estate, and hope to deal with the company at an early date. Shamvas.—Company estimates 25 per cent. Hold your shares, and write again after the demonstration to shareholders. Stirling Rubber.—An impertinent, unfounded, and libellous suggestion.

The Quarter.—1. Not at present. 2. In very good hands. 3. I am afraid not. 4. If well prepared, very little below Para. Tyke.—1. Your list consists mostly of shares with very fair speculative possibilities, but it is a mistake to put so large a proportion of your capital into speculative counters. Hold a and e. As to f, see first reply to "Aar." 2. Will not develop until next year. 3. You might do so if markets revive. Tabloid.—Taiping should suit you.

Umballa.—Should improve, but I hardly expect to see them at your figure so soon. Wait for favourable opportunity to sell. Ugie.—See Rubber Notes. Exchange for a Malayan company at first opportunity.

Verax.—Hold them all for the present. Viroperis.—Taiping.

Xallit.—1. Both good speculative purchases. Crudes. 2. I look for improvement, but cannot fix limit at present. 3. Of course, the profit is chiefly in shares, but I should hold for the present. 4. The capital can be usefully employed. The Madagascar shipments so far consist largely of purchased rubber, which is cleaned and sold at a profit.

Yock.—I prefer Taiping. Yam.—1. Glen Bervie should bring its rubber into bearing at the low capital cost of £20 per acre. Well managed, and already earning small dividends. A good purchase for steady capital appreciation. 2. See Rubber Notes.

Zenodorus.—1. Yes. Tandjong is quite good. 2. Sound enough. 3. No. Over-capitalised. Zutphen.—1. The company is in respectable hands, but it has had some trouble. The shares, I am afraid, are unmarketable, but it may turn out fairly well. 2. Will answer next week. 3. A legal problem on which you might get advice from the protection committee that has been formed.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ACONITE.—Anglo-Argentine Tramways Five per Cent. Debenture stock, Central Uruguay Five per Cent. Preference, and Grand Trunk Five per Cent. First Preference. ATELECTASIS.—Not a debenture I care for. I criticised the issue at the time it was made. The debentures were sold by the Investment Registry, a concern frequently criticised in TRUTH. ANGLOS.—The company is not as strong as it ought to be. I should sell both. ASH VALE.—1. Buenos Ayres Great Southern new preference is virtually a safe investment, and the new shares are well worth applying for. 2. Outlook very dubious.

BENEFIT.—It appears to be a very excellent society, and you need have little hesitation about taking shares. B. B.—Returning bucket-shop circulars in unstamped envelopes is a sheer futility. The bucket-shop keepers will not accept them, and all that happens is a waste of the time and labour in the Post Office. Of course, if your own name and address are enclosed you may get the circulars back yourself with the privilege of being doubly surcharged for postage. BREWERS.—1. The names of some Stock Exchange brokers have been forwarded. 2. William Harrold and Co. are bucket-shop keepers who should be avoided. 3. An obscure bucket-shop sheet. 4. Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 31, Threadneedle Street, E.C.

CLYDE.—Hold all three.

FORGET-ME-NOT.—You ought not to part with two such well-secured investments. FAILURE.—1. Hold. 2. See Rule 2. 3. These had better be sold. You will find one or two recommendations in this week's notes on Industrials.

HAVERSHAM.—Time will be required for the company to show what it can do, but I still regard the concern as one of the most promising in the new field. HOC.—Duncan Forbes and Co. are bucket-shop keepers against whom I have repeatedly warned my readers.

J. W. M.—There is talk of them going to 75. This may be an unduly pessimistic opinion, but for the present I do not look for any lasting recovery. In any case, India Threes yielding about 3¾ per cent., look the best bargain in the group.

KILKENNY.—1 and 2. The profits might as well be secured. 3. They look high enough. KITTEN.—A substantial dividend was promised, but production so far has failed badly to come up to official estimates. I should be inclined to cut the loss.

MAC.—The fact that the shares are unsaleable hardly makes one sanguine about dividend prospects. Your only chance of selling is through the agency of the secretary or an advertisement.

NOVICE (Fairview).—1. It may be due to difference in marketability; on the face of it, the stock looks the best purchase of the three. 2. There are so many stocks practically as good which give higher returns that I cannot see what is to bring about any lasting rise at present. 3. Ridiculous to think of speculating with £10. Put it in the Savings Bank, which was founded and still exists expressly to meet such a case.

OXO.—You might easily make a better selection. OLD MAID.—You would have been saved this loss if you had asked my advice or consulted the TRUTH Cautionary List. 1. Not securities that I recommend. 2. Probably the price offered is about right, but you might ask the manager of the Credit Lyonnais, Cockspur Street, S.W., for a quotation. 3. I cannot say—especially as you do not name the bonds. OILING.—I am glad to hear that you acted on my advice and withdrew your money from the Charing Cross Bank before the smash came. Read reply to "Parrot" and take your account to one of the leading joint stock banks. OAK.—I do not care to take the responsibility of recommending it. See reply to "Parrot."

PARROT.—1. It may be all right, but when having anything to do with a bank it is a good rule to err on the side of caution. People constantly buy shares knowing that they are taking some risk; when they deposit money with, or run an account with, a bank they ought to select only those institutions which, by reason of years of the most cautious finance, are in the best position to weather foul as well as fair weather. The public nowadays has no difficulty in doing its business with the old-established, well-founded joint stock banks, and therefore there is no excuse for it running after banks of second or third grade. 2. Your broker may turn out right in time; the company has in the past paid good dividends. 3. Yes, you are wrong; the London and British Stock and Share Corporation has frequently been pilloried in TRUTH. P. A. B.—Hardly worth selling at present; you might wait and see the outcome of the proposed agreement between the English and German producers to restrict the output, if necessary.

QUAESTOR.—No; have nothing to do with such circularisers.

RICK.—I referred unfavourably to the concern a few weeks ago. On the whole, it might be as well to cut the loss. R. C.—I do not recommend either of them. See reply to "Parrot."

TOM TIT.—a. None safe, but Burmahs, Shells, and Spies come nearest to the rank of investments, and will probably improve when conditions in the oil market become more settled. TUDOR.—I do not care to take the responsibility of recommending it. TYRO.—No, the Equitable Exchange is a common bucket shop.

VIRLECO.—It is a case for legal opinion. Even if there were solid ground for action, it would probably not be worth while to take it unless the shareholders themselves combined in force to share the expense.

WATSON.—1. I should not refuse a moderate profit. 2. Not a share I care for. The company is over-capitalised. W. H. P.—Your letter came too late for reply last week, but you will see that I made a passing reference to the company. The new shares should make a good investment. WAKE UP.—1. I am afraid you made a mistake in buying at all. Oil shares are not the things for the small man. Those you have are highly speculative, and the best advice I can give you is to face the loss now and reinvest the proceeds in a secure investment, such, for instance, as one of the stocks recommended to "Seeker" under "Mixed Securities." As regards 7, the matter will probably be referred to at length in another part of the paper. You will find an answer to 8 given in the first reply to "Parrot." WHIG.—a. You might hold for the present, and keep a close watch on the market. b. Better leave them alone until the market outlook is clearer. c. Either Metropolitan Electric Trams Five per Cent. Debenture stock or the Carlton Hotel Debentures referred to in this week's article. I would not split so small an amount as £200. WESTERN.—1. I do not advise dealing with the Universal Stock Exchange or any outside firms. Do your business through a broker who is a member of the Stock Exchange. 2. "Stocks and Shares," by Hartley Withers (Smith, Elder and Co., price 7s. 6d.); or "Cordingley's Guide to the Stock Exchange" (Effingham Wilson, price 2s.)

YAW.—I have never heard that they have failed to pay up, but it is a business of the bucket-shop class in which they make their gains out of the losses of their customers and as such it should be shunned.

ZONEKE.—a. India Three per Cent. Inscribed stock. b. If you have no broker, your local bank would put through the business.

INSURANCE.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—INADEQUATE STATISTICS—IMMORAL RESULTS OF LEGISLATION—EXCESSIVE CLAIMS.

I HAVE been endeavouring to do some clear thinking on the subject of unemployment insurance, about which in certain political circles a good deal has been said. The Permanent Secretary to the Board of Trade dealt with the subject in his capacity of President of the Economic Section of the British Association; and Mr. A. R. Barrand read an instructive paper on the same subject at The Hague last month. Of course, the idea of insurance of this kind is to provide some payment for people who are out of work, and yet to avoid encouraging idleness, and to prevent fraud. Nobody knows yet what the cost of such a system of insurance would work out at. There are at least two reasons for this ignorance: one is that no adequate data exist in regard to past experience; and the second is that nobody can tell what the increase in unemployment will prove to be when payments are made for being out of work.

In certain selected and organised trades some records are available, but not, I believe, of a kind that are particularly useful for future guidance. It would seem advisable for no compensation to be paid unless the unemployment continues for more than a certain limited period, say, for example, one week. The importance of excluding the payment of benefits when the unemployment is quite brief is very manifest in connection with workmen's compensation and other forms of insurance. It is probable that the urgent need of unemployment insurance is greater among the lowest and least skilled classes of workers, in regard to whom information is much more scanty than it is in connection with skilled workers and highly organised trades. It should be remembered that the first Workmen's Compensation Act was limited to a few specified trades, and it was only when some experience had been gained that the system was extended to practically all employees. It appears advisable and probable that this course should be adopted in connection with unemployment insurance, even though the need for such insurance may be greatest among the classes who will at first be excluded from the benefits of the system.

Mr. Barrand made a sound point when he said that "the introduction of unemployment insurance is likely to have a moral, or rather immoral, effect on the rate of unemployment, and to cause a perceptible increase in that rate." Experience under the Workmen's Compensation Act, some interesting returns in connection with which have just been published, showed that compensation for accidents was greater after the passing of the Act than it was before. This is a point to which I have frequently referred when commenting on the losses experienced by cautious and well-managed companies on workmen's compensation business. The existence of compensation has developed to a high point the art of making fraudulent and excessive claims, the bulk of the financial profit from which goes, it is to be feared, into the pockets of shady solicitors. I am very greatly afraid that a system of unemployment insurance would render the trade of the unscrupulous lawyer even more profitable than it is at present.

Another feature of an unsatisfactory character is revealed by the recent Blue Book on Workmen's Compensation. An overwhelming preponderance of the cases which came before the courts were decided in favour of the workmen. It is safe to assume that the bulk of these cases were, in fact, against insurance companies, who would not have brought them into court unless they had every expectation of winning them. In this connection insurance companies are distinctly immoral, though probably, in the interests of their shareholders, they cannot afford to be anything else. Countless cases are settled by the offices which they ought to contest, but it is cheaper to pay than to fight, and so they pay. I have no doubt whatever in my own mind that there is an enormous amount of injustice in the courts owing to the fact that juries, and very often judges, sympathise with claimants, and regard an insurance company as a wealthy corporation whose business is to pay whether their case is right or wrong. Of course, it is not the insurance companies who suffer by this process—that is to say, it is not the shareholders or their officials—but the other policy-holders. The honest man has to pay a higher premium in order that the dishonest may get more than his due.

It seems a reasonable certainty that this evil will be intensified if any system of unemployment insurance is introduced, and, whatever statistics of past experience may be collected, surprisingly large additions in regard to the amount of unemployment will have to be made to them in order to provide for the increased unemployment that will occur as a direct consequence of the introduction of a system of unemployment insurance.

It is said that the cost of the benefits is to be contributed partly by the workers, partly by the employers, and partly by the State. Presumably there would be fixed contributions from the two former classes, and the State would make up the difference. Under the Workmen's Compensation Act the entire burden is borne directly by the employer; he secures himself by taking a policy with an insurance company; the amount of the premium increases the working expenses of the business, and is in effect paid by the consumer. The beginnings of all forms of insurance have been of an experimental character, and in the early stages information was lacking as to the precise, or even approximate, cost of the risks insured against. This experience will no doubt be repeated in connection with unemployment insurance, but things will settle down in course of time, and the cost will be spread over the whole community, with the result that no one will be conscious of making any contribution to the cost. The system, therefore, seems to me to be one which it would be well to adopt, but it is exceedingly easy to inaugurate it on wrong and expensive lines, and very difficult to start it in sound and economical ways. Probably the Government Bill dealing with the matter will be available before long, and then it will be interesting to consider its provisions in the light of the experience gained from other departments of insurance.

Answers to Correspondents.

[Inquiries on the subject of insurance are answered in this column every week. Every letter containing an inquiry must be accompanied by a coupon cut from the third page of the coloured cover of Truth.]

Argus.—If you can pass medical examination as a first-class life and do not have to pay extra for naval service, I think you will accomplish your purpose to the best advantage by taking fifteen-year with-profit endowment assurance from the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. If this does not prove exactly what you want, I should like to hear from you again. Fiend.—The society is entirely sound and good, and you can effect assurance with it with every confidence. Ignorance.—I cannot regard the company you mention as satisfactory for annuities. I also doubt the wisdom of buying an annuity at so young an age as yours, but if you want to do so I should advise the Northern Assurance Company. E. H. S.—Insurance inquiries should be made in a separate letter. Let me know the age, and I will advise you which is the best office. The one you mention cannot be considered satisfactory. Chaman.—The pamphlet about valued policies which you send is issued primarily for the purpose of securing work and profit for the firm by whom it is issued. On the whole, I do not believe that these valued policies are worth their total cost, from a policy-holder's point of view. The office in which you are insured is quite sound and liberal in its settlements. This and other companies would quite certainly treat you not only in a fair but a generous manner. Unol, J. H. Swinford, J. F. (Macroom), J. W. U. (Wolverhampton).—I hope to deal with the subject of your letters in my article next week. I may say that it is unsatisfactory to go on and unsatisfactory to stop, but I hope to be able to clear up the position to some extent.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

WEST MEXICAN MINES.

Mr. J. Barr Robertson presided at a meeting of the West Mexican Mines, Limited, held to hear an account from Mr. J. S. MacArthur, the company's consulting engineer, of his recent visit to the Rosario Mine at Guadalupe-y-Calvo, Chihuahua, Mexico.

Mr. MacArthur, after describing the geographical features of the country, said: The mine has been worked intermittently since its discovery in 1835, and on the mountain side there are large deposits of second-class ore, the remains of former working. We do not know how much gold and silver was extracted from the rich ore selected out during the past years, but we do know that in one period of nine years—1838 to 1846—bullion tax, as recorded in the Government archives, was paid on $8,000,000 worth of bullion (say, £1,600,000), while probably bullion to the value of over £3,000,000 was extracted. We have fallen heir to these great heaps of ready-mined ore. In the old days it was only possible to work rich ore because the one method available was by Arrastra. By this method the total amount of ore that could be worked was trivial compared with the real magnitude of the mine. It therefore follows that the ore dumps constitute an involuntary but accurate sample of the whole mine, representing probably under the average value of the ore rather than over. Engineers who have visited the mine within the last few years have repeatedly measured and assayed these dumps, and the average figures of their work show about 170,000 tons of ore, assaying above $10 gold value. I considered it my first duty on arrival to check these figures, and I found, by my assistants, with a large staff parcelling the dumps on the west side into sections, measuring and sampling them, that the amount came out roughly at over 170,000 tons, assaying fully $10.

Value of the Mine.—The mine itself may be said to consist of two parts. First, the large outcrop of the vein, which extends for 1,700 ft. along the crest of the hill, and which, where exposed, varies in width from 35 ft. at the north end to over 300 ft. at the south end, and which stands up as huge open quarries in some places 135 ft. high. These quarries are worked by blasting the face. With this system of working no block out or development work in the ordinary sense of the term was needed, the quarry face yielding the ore as and when required. Consequently, as only the face of the quarries could have been measured, with the exception of one small block of 5,000 tons at the south end, no portion of the ore in those quarries has been taken into account in appraising the value of the mine, or in estimating the amount of ore in sight. The records for large quantities of this ore actually treated give an average of $13.7.

Rich Ore.—The portions of the veins stoped for rich ore of, say, $50 per ton and over, are shown at the north end and in the centre of the mine. At the time of my visit these stopes were partly caved in and inaccessible to a man of my proportions, but I induced our most reliable Mexican miner to enter the centre stope and obtain samples, which assayed, as shown on the plan, as high as $277 per ton, and averaged $103. My own assistant subsequently crept by himself through the narrow space behind the crushed timbers, and obtained a fair sample assaying $126 per ton. Some of the rich ore has been left standing in the mine, and it is reasonable to suppose that more will be opened up as the development of the mine proceeds, but I think it better meanwhile to consider the mine as essentially one of a large mass of good ordinary grade. In check-sampling the mine I went over much the same ground as Mr. Argall, and can quite confirm his estimate of value and of the minimum tonnage of reserve ore, which is sufficient to run a 500-ton mill for almost two years. We propose now to do such development work as will enable us to determine the full workable width of the lode, and we expect when this work is accomplished that we shall have increased our ore reserves several times over, and be in a position to maintain, even with a larger mill than one of 500 tons, a constant reserve exceeding the quarter of a million tons now available.

The mill records kept by recent owners of the mine confirm previous reports and what we ourselves found as to assay values. They also throw some light on the reason why the mine has been secured by your directors. I find that the average extraction by amalgamation process then employed did not reach 50 per cent. of the value contained. The problem of extraction and the cost of the huge new plant which would have been required proved too great a risk for the former owners. I found that the ore was quite amenable to cyanide treatment, latterly obtaining an extraction of over 90 per cent.

After completing those tests I was able to decide as to the method of treatment, and have had the plans prepared, and have fixed on a site for erection of a cyanide plant to treat 500 tons per day, the foundations of which are now practically completed.

Coming now to costs and profits, we have the absolute knowledge of over a quarter of a million tons of ore, mostly on the dumps, ready for use; besides this, we have large masses on the outcrop quarries available for open cast working. The dump ore contains a gross value of $10 per ton, and on this basis we should make a profit of $6 to $7.50 per ton, depending on whether we had to pay for mining or not; milling and cyaniding together should not exceed about $1.50 per ton. As our unit of plant is now to be 500 tons per day, we hope to make a working profit of $3,400 per day, or about £200,000 for 300 working days. With the large amount of ore in the dumps, the outcrop quarries, and the ore in sight in the mine, this profit can be earned just as quickly as we can erect and operate our crushing and cyaniding plant, and I see no reason why profits should not be maintained on this basis indefinitely.

In reply to a question, the Chairman said that the capital available was sufficient to instal a plant to treat 500 tons per day, as recommended by Mr. MacArthur.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY.

Mr. A. W. Smithers, presiding at the meeting of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, held on the 24th inst., said that the gross receipts had increased during the half-year by £455,000, spread over all departments. The strike during the past year had been ended by a settlement which would mean that the company would have to pay about £120,000 per annum more by increased wages. Owing to the ever-increasing claims on railway companies from all quarters increased gross traffic was being eaten up by higher working expenses. He thought, however, encouragement could be found by looking at the past and comparing the financial state of railways on the American continent to day with what it was fifteen years ago. In 1895 more than half the American railways were in bankruptcy, while now those railways which had been constructed in good territories were paying dividends of 5 or 7 per cent., and others showed improved positions. The position of the Grand Trunk Company had considerably improved. He thought higher wages had come to stay, but they could only be paid if the capital employed received an adequate return.

They were engaged on one of the greatest undertakings in the world. They were bound to have difficulties and to overcome them. The only trouble was want of labour, the demand for which in Canada was greater than the supply. The wealth and prosperity of Canada was broadening every year. As yet only the fringe of the cultivable area of Canada had been touched. The prosperity of the future of Canada was based in the sure foundation that the world wanted what the Dominion could best supply.

Mr. Smithers dealt at great length with the visit he had paid during the past year to the property of the company, dwelling on the improvement in the situation and the great prospects of the line and its various connections and extensions. At Ottawa, he said, the new stations were nearly finished, and they would have as tenants there the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Northern, and New York Central railways. A new station was also being built at Detroit, which would cost with electrification twenty million dollars, and the company would, no doubt, use it on terms. As to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, they had now a splendid terminus at Fort William ready for traffic, and capable of being enlarged. The new main line to Edmonton passed through a country which was nearly all first-class wheat land, and their branch line also passed for the most part through good wheat lands.

Mr. Hermann Landau, referring to the higher wages paid to railway men, said he thought these would have to be met by increased rates. He commented on the board's financial policy, and said that they were paying enormous sums out of revenue which, in the case of other railways, were charged to capital account. On that score he thought that the third preference stockholders, who were the sufferers, had legitimate cause for complaint.

The Chairman replied to the discussion, and said that the value of the junior securities of the company, like those of any other railway company in a similar position, was in the reversion of the future, and it was only by keeping the companies' credit unimpaired and by being able to raise the additional capital, which had brought the system, to a great extent, up to date, that this reversion could be realised. The value of that reversion was never so great, in his opinion, as it was to-day. With regard to wages, he noticed with hope the action that the labour unions in the United States were taking as to the raising of wages, and he believed that the great body of the people in Canada would see that it would be necessary, if the demands on the railway companies went on, to give the company some hope of increased rates in order to enable them to meet the higher wages which were demanded.

The report was adopted unanimously.

BALDWINS, LTD.

Colonel John Roper Wright presided on the 20th inst., at the Grand Hotel, Birmingham, over the annual meeting of the shareholders of Baldwins, Ltd. He was supported by the following other directors:—Messrs. Isaac Butler, Roger Beck, S. L. Dore, W. C. Wright, and A. I. R. Butler. The report showed profits on manufacturing and trading accounts, after providing for discounts, amounting to £149,096.

In moving the adoption of the report, the Chairman said: Considering the trade of the past year, I think we may congratulate ourselves on the result of the last year's working. You will see from the accounts the company's profits are somewhat below the previous year, a result which compares not unfavourably with the general experience in the trades in which your company is engaged. It will be seen that we have paid sinking fund premiums on the whole of the debenture stock authorised—that is, on £500,000, against £250,000 last year, though we have issued only £117,151 of the £250,000 additional stock. It should be noted with satisfaction by debenture holders and shareholders alike that there is thus creating a sinking fund of important asset value. We have added to reserve £30,000, making the very satisfactory total of £180,000. In recommending a dividend of 5 per cent., your directors are continuing their usual conservative policy. You probably know that the new tin plate works near the King's Dock, Swansea, have now started, and I am glad to say the result is quite justifying the expenditure. There are now four mills working, and I hope the remaining eight mills will be on by the end of the year. I may report that all our branches are in good order and are working satisfactorily. I have pleasure in proposing the adoption of the accounts.

Mr. Isaac Butler, in seconding the resolution, said that, taking all things into consideration, he thought the debenture holders and shareholders should be highly satisfied with the result of the year's working.

The motion was carried unanimously.

The Chairman next moved: "That in accordance with the directors' recommendation, a dividend of 5 per cent., free of income tax, be paid on the amounts paid up on the ordinary shares, and that the same be payable this day."

This was seconded by Mr. Roger Beck, who remarked that he was the remaining member of the original trio, and said he was happy indeed that they were in a position to declare the dividend as conscientiously as they did.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

Messrs. Aubrey I. R. Butler and W. Charles Wright were re-elected directors, and the auditors, Messrs. Turquand, Youngs and Co., having been reappointed, the proceedings terminated with a cordial vote of thanks to the directors and to the chairman for his conduct in the chair.

QUEER STORY.

THE DISCHARGE OF O'DOWD.

WHEN I first made the acquaintance of O'Dowd, he was a postman in the East Central district—a fine, well-set-up man, who carried his sixty years lightly, and still (although it was upwards of a quarter of a century since he had left the Army) unmistakably the old soldier. A typical Paddy he was, too, justifying his name alike in physiognomy, in manner, and in conversation. Genial, irresponsible, droll, loquacious, engaging, he was a universal favourite and made friends wherever he went. To hear him talk was a rich treat. Sometimes of an evening I would get him round to my rooms to smoke a pipe with me. It was on one of these occasions that he told me the story of his discharge from the Army. The subject came up through a casual reference of mine to the difficulty that old soldiers often found in obtaining civil employment; and I went on to inquire whether he had experienced any trouble of the sort when he quitted the Service.

"Devil a bit, sorr," he answered, with a genial smile. "You see, me papers spoke for themselves. I was discharged wid an exemplary character, sorr."

Then he suddenly fell a-chuckling.

"What are you laughing for?" I inquired.

"I was thinking, sorr," he rejoined. "Things often work round in a funny way. Now, what d'ye think it was as earned me me discharge wid an exemplary characther, sorr?"

"Your good behaviour while you were with the colours, I suppose," was my reply.

Again he fell a-chuckling.

"'Twas nothing of the kind, sorr," he said. "I was always a bit of a harum-scarum and for ever getting into scrapes; although there was no real harm in me. No, sorr. If it had depended on me good conduct while I was wid the colours, I shouldn't be where I am. It was something quite different as earned me me exemplary characther, sorr. I'll tell you, for ye'd never guess. 'Twas all along of me stealin' a pair of throusers."

"Stealing a pair of trousers? Come, O'Dowd; you are pulling my leg," I interposed.

"No, sorr. It's gospel true," he answered. "Me characther was made by stealin' them throusers; and I'll tell ye how it was."

He paused a minute to refill and light his pipe. Then he plunged, with evident zest, into his narration:

"I was at Weedon, at the rigimintal depot, when it happened. D'ye know Weedon, sorr?"

I replied that I had passed through the place, but had never been inside the barracks.

"Barracks, sorr," said O'Dowd, "is hardly the word. 'Tisn't like or'nary barracks. A sort of old counthry house, it is; I believe 'twas once the huntin'-box of King George IV. Anyhow, 'tis quite off the usual lines of barracks; and the officers' quarters look out at the back on a purty flower garden. The best quarters, after the colonel's, of course, were those of the major—Major Kingstrip—who commanded the depot. And the major's servant was a private of ours, by name Hathaway. He was no favourite with the men, sorr, wasn't Hathaway, being a worm of a chap and too much given to sneakin'. We all had our knives into him, and meself most of all.

"Well, one day, sorr, I was passing along at the back of the officers' quarters when I saw Hathaway spreadin' out his Sunday-best throusers on a bush in the major's garden. I believe he'd been takin' grease spots out of 'em wid benzine or something of the sort. Anyway, they were moist and he was putting 'em in the sun to dhry. This, you must know, was on a Sathurday afternoon, sorr.

"As I've told ye, I was always a bit of a harum-scarum; and now a sudden impulse tock me. What a spree, thinks I, to pinch them throusers and hide 'em away somewhere so that, come next day, when Hathaway wanted to cut a dash in 'em for the benefit of his best girl, he shouldn't be able to find 'em.

"So I waited, sorr, till Hathaway had gone indoors again; then I skipped up to the throusers and nicked 'em. But by a piece of sinful luck, sorr, as I was making me escape I ran into one of the sergeants wid them throusers under me arm.

"The sergeant didn't exactly love me. I had often worried him before wid me pranks, and I was down in his books as one of the black sheep of the rigiment. So he was rather glad than otherwise of this chance of jumpin' on me. 'Twas in vain I protested that the pinchin' of Hathaway's throusers was only a lark. He scoffed at me protest. I was put under arrest and marched off to the guard-room.

"On the Monday I was up before the major, who put me back for court-martial, and on Saturday the court sat, the major presiding. It didn't take long, sorr. They wouldn't believe me defence, although the captain of me company, Captain Morton, attended and spoke for me. I was sentenced to six months' imprisonment and to be branded on me chest with the letters B.C., which, as perhaps you know, stand for 'Bad characther,' sorr."

"Branded?" I exclaimed, "I didn't know they were ever guilty of that barbarity in the British Army."

"Well, they called it branding, sorr," explained O'Dowd. "But 'twasn't quite as bad as it sounds, not being done with a hot-iron, but with a sort of punch; and then gunpowder was inthrojuced, as the sailors do when they tattoo themselves. It was the reg'lar practice in the army in those days, sorr. There were two brands—B.C. for 'bad characther,' and D for 'deserter.' And a man thus branded carried the marks to his grave. Of course, it has been done away with these many years now. But so it was then. And I'll warrant there are a good few old soldiers still living with one or other of these tattoo-marks on the chests of them.

"Me sentence was carried out, sorr. I was branded in the way I've told ye, and sent to the military prison. There I was kept for three weeks, and then they had to let me out. They couldn't help themselves. 'Twas by the orders of the Judge-Advocate-Gineral, sorr.

"Ye see, sorr, the papers relatin' to me trial had been sent along to him, in due course, for confirmation. And being a lawyer, he at once spotted a certain little flaw which the major hadn't noticed. I was charged, ye mind, with stealin' the major's servant's throusers. Now, as military law then stood, the major's servant's throusers were legally the major's own throusers. So 'twas the major's throusers I'd pinched, and yet here he'd been presiding over the court-martial that had convicted me of pinching 'em. This, said the Judge-Advocate-Gineral—and more power to his elbow for it!—was grossly irregular. The major had no right at all to sit on a court-martial dealing with the theft of his own property; because, you see, he was what the lawyers call an intherested party. Consequently, the conviction must be quashed; and I must be reinstated in the rigiment, just as though nothing had happened. Purty mad the major was over it, too. But those were the Judge-Advocate-Gineral's orders, and he was obliged to carry them out.

"And here it was, sorr," proceeded O'Dowd, with a chuckle, "that meself began to come into me own. Begob, it sets me off laughin' whenever I think of it.

"I'm referrin', sorr, to them letters B.C., which they'd tattooed on the chest of me. Now while I was in prison I'd amused me leisure moments—which weren't many—by getting me mouth down to me chest and trying to suck the gunpowder out of the marks. 'Twas a difficult job, sorr. But I did manage, after great efforts, to get rid of the B. And that was as much as I could do. The gunpowder in the C seemed to have taken better, so to speak. Anyway I could make no impression on it, and there it remained. 'Twas this that rankled wid me, sorr. And ye can understand why. Me conviction havin' been quashed, all record of it had to be expunged. Them were the Judge-Advocate-Gineral's orders. Yet here was one of the records tattooed on me chest as large as life, and I unable to get rid of it. Me sowl revolted at the injustice of it, sorr; and I made up me mind to give the authorities no rest until them that had done me the wrong had put it right again.

"So on the second morning after me coming out of prison, I went to the major's office and asked if I could speak to him.

"'Well, what is it, O'Dowd?' says he, looking up from his desk wid a black scowl on the face of him.

"'Tis only me rights I want, major,' says I, bringing me hand to the salute, very polite and respectful. "Has me conviction for pinchin' Private Hathaway's Sunday-best throusers been quashed, or has it not, sorr?'

"'Of course it has,' says the major, scowlin' blacker than ever. 'You know that as well as I do.'

"'Well, the other question I wish to ask ye, sorr,' says I, still very polite and respectful, 'is this: Did the Judge-Advocate-Gineral give orders that all record of my conviction was to be expunged, or did he not, sorr?'

"'Look here! What the deuce are you driving at? The record has been expunged from the regimental books. I saw to it myself yesterday,' says the major, his scowl now as black as ink at the inquisitive persistence of me.

"QUEER STORIES" from TRUTH. Now ready, Series XVI. Price 1s., at all booksellers, and from the Publisher, 10, Bolt Court, Fleet Street. "They are one of the wonders of the world, these stories, and people are never tired of asking who writes them."—Bystander.

"'Quite so, sorr,' says I. 'And it's much obliged to ye I am. But there's another record that hasn't been expunged. D'ye see this, sorr?'

"And I bared me bosom, showing the big blue C on the chest of me, just over me heart.

"'D'ye see this, sorr?' I repeats.

"'Hulloa!' exclaims the major, knittin' his brows fiercely till they met above the root of his nose. 'What's that C doing there by itself? What the deuce has become of the B, I'd like to know.'

"'I've expunged the B by sucking, sorr,' says I. 'But divil a bit of impression can I make on the C. Now, what are ye goin' to do about it, major? That's what I'm making bould to ask, sorr.'

"'Do about it?' says he, very haughty and contemptuous. 'Nothing.'

"'I beg your pardon, sorr,' says I, still wid the utmost respect. 'But 'tis claimin' me rights I am under the Judge-Advocate-Gineral's orders. Again, I make bould to ask ye, what d'ye mean to do about it, major?'

"'Oh! go to blazes!' roars the major, losin' control of himself in his irritation.

"'Then it only remains for me, sorr, to petition the War Office,' says I, still quite calm and respectful.

"'You may petition the devil for all I care, O'Dowd,' storms the major. 'Now then, clear out of this, you impudent jackanapes.'

"Well, sorr, I saluted and left the office widout another word. I knew better than to wrangle wid me superior officer. And I believe the major thought he'd heard the last of me. But he was mistaken, sorr. I got hold of Jack Pridgin, the company's lawyer; and between us we drew up a statement of me grievance, which we took to Captain Morton, and asked him to get it forwarded to the Secretary for War.

"By return of post they sent a printed form acknowledgin' the favour of the communication and sayin' it should have attention. Of course, I knew what that meant. It was just their playful little way of hanging up me complaint indefinitely. And I just smiled, sorr, as I says to meself, says I, 'Arrah, me bhoys! Don't be afther flatthering yourselves. Ye'll not find that wash wid Private O'Dowd.'

"I waited a week, sorr, and then I sent another letter. This time there came an answer to say that it appeared to be a matter for the Horse Guards. 'Twas like Adam and Eve over again, ye see, sorr. The Secretary for War wanted to be shot of me grievance, wid all the inconveniences of it, so he shouldered it on to the Commander-in-Chief. 'Twas a way they had in the Army in those days, sorr. I'm towld they're rather partial to it still. I daresay the authorities calculated that I'd soon get sick of being driven from pillar to post. But, begorra! they didn't know Private O'Dowd.

"I wrote, through Captain Morton, to the Horse Guards, sorr, and all I got was another of the usual printed forms acknowledgin' the communication and saying it should have attention. And I sat on it again for a week, to see if anything would come of it, though I knew well enough that nothing would. It didn't, of course. So I wrote, through the captain, again. There was no answer; and then the major sent for me.

"'Look here,' he said, 'I'm sick of you and your complaints. For the Lord's sake, clear out of this. It's the furlough season; you can take a month.' So he told the clerk to make out the papers, 'and begob,' thinks I to meself, 'I'll spend them four weeks wid me married sister in London. And I warrant, before they're over, the War Office or the Horse Guards, or some of 'em, will be just about fed up wid Private Timothy O'Dowd.'

"That month, sorr, was the most enjoyable of me life. There were me courtin' days. They weren't bad. And there was me honeymoon. That wasn't so dusty. But they were neither of 'em a patch on the time I spent commendin' me grievance personally to the military bigwigs. I was sent backwards and forwards between the War Office and the Horse Guards, till I was on intimate terms wid every paving-stone between the two o' them. And what time I didn't spend walking there and back I spent, so to speak, camping on one or other of their doorsteps. Begorra! How the officials came to dread the sight of me! Arrah, 'twas something like livin', that was! 'Twas the time of me existence, sorr.

"So far I'd confined me attentions to the subordinates. But one mornin', as I was lyin' in ambush on the Horse Guards Parade, who should I see coming along but an elderly gentleman wid grey whiskers and a big umbrella. I recognised him at once, sorr. 'Twas the Commander-in-Chief himself—His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge.

"'Begorra,' says I to myself. 'Tis the chance of your lifetime, Private Timothy O'Dowd.'

"So I plants meself in his way and salutes him very respectful.

"'Beggin' your pardon, can I speak wid your Royal Highness?' says I.

"'Who are you? What do you want?' says he.

"Then I towld him me grievance and petitioned him for redress.

"'All right, my man,' says he. 'I'll see what can be done.'

"And he passed on. I reckon he thought he'd put me off like that and done wid me for good and all. But he soon found 'twasn't so aisy gettin' done with Timothy O'Dowd.

"I laid in wait for him next morning.

"'What the blazes! You here again?' he says.

"'Yes, sorr—I mean your Royal Highness,' says I, drawin' meself up and salutin'. 'I make bowld to ask if anything has been done about expunging this tattoo-mark from the chest of me, your Royal Highness?'

"'You seem to be in a dickens of a hurry,' says he. 'I've something else to do, let me tell you, than attend to your confounded tattoo-marks.'

"And he moved on.

"Well, of course, I couldn't leave it at that. Next day I was in the same place again. The Duke caught sight of me, sorr, and he made a detour to avoid me. But I was movin' on interior lines, as they say in the service, and I cut him off.

"'Askin' your Royal Highness's pardon,' says I, drawin' meself up and salutin'.

"'Look here, my man,' says he, wid an angry scowl on the face of him. 'I'm not going to have the life worried out of me by your dashed nonsense. Don't you come botherin' here again or it'll be the worse for ye.'

"But I was determined to have me rights, sorr; so next day, sure enough, there I was in the same place again. This time there was high ructions. The Duke fairly lost his temper, and went for me bald-headed, as the sayin' is. Called me an impudent vagabond, he did, and told me that, as I was so bent on getting me rights, I should have 'em when I rejoined my depot—through me commanding officer. I didn't like his nasty way of sayin' it. It began to dawn on me that I'd worried him a bit too far. However, 'tis always aisy to be wise afterwards.

"Well, sorr, I rejoined me depot at the end of the week. And there I was told by the major, with that nasty smile of his, that orders had been received from the Commander-in-Chief for me discharge from the Army as an incorrigibly bad characther."

"'Och! The wicked shame of it,' cries I, boiling over wid hot indignation.

"'You've asked for it yourself, my fine fellow,' says the major. 'If you'd had any sense, you'd have let well alone. Anyway, the Commander-in-Chief's orders must be carried out. There'll be a board of officers this afternoon to deal wid 'em.'

"I left the major's office wid me heart in my boots. Seemed to me then that I'd ruined meself for life. But there was a silver streak, sorr, in the black cloud afther all.

"'Twas the captain of me company, Captain Morton. The captain spoke up for me like a man. They couldn't put the incorrigibly bad characther on me widout his confirmation. And he absolutely refused to give it. Said he'd always found me a very good soldier, and he wasn't going to blast me career for life wid a characther like that. He stuck to it, too—may the saints bless him for it! The major couldn't move him. . . . All this I heard aftherwards from one of the orderlies who was listening at the door.

"Well, sorr, the matter was referred back to the Commander-in-Chief; and, from what I gathered, a good deal of correspondence followed. Captain Morton was sent for to the Horse Guards. But he stood out. And as they couldn't do what they wanted widout his signature, matters rested there for a week or two.

"Then, by a stroke of luck, I managed to get a day's leave. And off I went to London to make me humble apologies to the Commander-in-Chief and beseech him, on me bended knees, to withdraw his order.

"I lay in wait for him at the same old place on the Horse Guards' Parade, meanin' to catch him when he came out to lunch. Just afther one o'clock I saw him emerge from the door. I moved forward. When I was ten paces distant, he saw me.

"'Oh, d——n! You here again?' he says, startin' back in dismay. And he skipped inside wid marvellous agility for a man of his years and slammed the door behind him.

"That, sorr, was the last time I ever set eyes on the Duke.

"Next day a letter came down to Weedon from His Royal Highness's military secretary. I didn't see it meself. But one of the sergeants did, being left lyin' on the major's desk, and he towld me what was in it, word for word. It went something like this—I ain't ever likely to forget it:—

Sir,—

"Re Pte. O'Dowd.

"I am desired by the Commander-in-Chief to inform you that he positively declines to be subjected to any further worry in this matter. The man must be got rid of, and—to save trouble—you will be pleased to discharge him forthwith with an exemplary character. Kindly attend to this without delay.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"A. F. Robins, Lieut.-Col."

O'Dowd paused at this dramatic point in his narrative. Then, with a theatrical gesture, he unbuttoned his tunic and bared to me his manly bosom.

"See that, sorr?" he said.

I looked; and there I saw tattooed upon his chest the letters E.C.

"When folks see that for the first time," he said, "they nat'rally take it for the letters of me disthrict, and look on it as a kind of post-mark. But, after what I've told ye, ye'll not be makin' that mistake. The letters stand for 'Exemplary Characther,' sorr—by me own creation."

"Ah! you had the E. tattooed there on your own account?" said I.

"Thrue for ye, sorr," answered O'Dowd. "I got a tattoo-artist to do it for me at the price of half-a-dollar. And the best of it was, sorr, that when I thought I'd have a bit of fun wid the authorities, and sent the bill in to the Commander-in-Chief, I had a letter back to say that, though there was no authority in the regulations for such a payment, His Royal Highness enclosed me 2s. 6d. out of his own pocket, and a cheap riddance at the money."

BOOKS.

LORD MORLEY told Sir Leslie Stephen, who, in turn, told me, that Froude, when consulted as Oxford Professor of History by a student who was meditating the writing of historical essays, advised thus:—"First, get a framework in your own mind of what you want to prove, and then look out facts for its support." Advice which reminds you of the philosopher Chrisippus's resolution—"to learn the doctrines only of his masters, Zeno and Cleanthes, since he could pick up reasons and proofs enough anywhere for anything!" Of all historical periods that of the French Revolution at once most excites and most lends itself to parti pris treatment of this kind. From Carlyle to Taine each historian of the French Revolution has brought to its study his own preconceived theory, and found for its support, what they could not fail to find, sufficiently convincing facts. Now you have M. Aulard's "The French Revolution: A Political History" (1), disposing as conclusively of Carlyle and of Taine as M. Aulard himself, no doubt, will be conclusively disposed of by some succeeding theorist. What M. Aulard has most to fear from such a successor is that he will be "hoist with his own petard"—with facts and documents supplied by himself in overwhelming abundance; since it is little likely that any future historian of the Revolution will be at the immense pains M. Aulard has taken in his twenty years' study of "the principal journals, correspondences, deliberations, speeches, election papers, and also of the biographies of those who played a part in the political life of the time." To say the whole truth, only such an historian or at least serious historical student will plod with profit through M. Aulard's forest of facts, where you can hardly see the wood for the trees. The notes alone, which intersect the main track at every step, serve to distract and bewilder you till at times you lose your bearings altogether. There is, however, one conclusion which M. Aulard seems to establish indisputably:—"It is a mistake to say that the French Revolution was effected by a few distinguished individuals, by a few super-men. No individual emerges from the history of the ten years between 1789 and 1799 as the master of events—neither Louis XVI., nor Mirabeau, nor Danton, nor Robespierre." For my own part, I think Mme. Roland was here nearer the truth than Carlyle and other hero-finders of the Revolution when she says in her Mémoires:—"France was as though drained of men; their rarity in this revolution is truly an astonishing thing; there were practically none but pigmies." On the other hand, M. Aulard seems to leave out of account the two things which made the Revolution a success in spite of its lack of great leaders—first, the misery of the people, townsmen and peasants alike, and, secondly, French moral cowardice, which cowers under a few bold, loud leaders like a flock of sheep herded by a barking collie. "An army," said Napoleon, "marches on its belly," and a revolution marches also on its (empty) belly. It was the utter and absolute misery of a people oppressed not by a single tyrant, but by a multitude of tyrants, each fastened on each village throughout France, like a cheetah on the back of a flying deer whose life-blood it is draining dry. Again in France Danton's "de l'audace, encore de l'audace, et toujours de l'audace" is more effective, owing to the moral cowardice of the French, than in any other country. In France, too, it must be remembered in reading the windy rhetoric of the Revolution, abstract ideas intoxicate the mind as a distilled spirit will madden the brain; and, as Goethe says, "Abstract ideas and great conceit are ever on the road to produce terrible catastrophes." Another element which went to feed the fire of the Revolution was at once the fear and the fury of the people at the threat of foreign intervention and invasion. Before closing my notice of this encyclopædic work on the Revolution, I should like to acknowledge my indebtedness to it for the clear disentangling of the confusing and even conflicting ideas which "The French Revolution" is made to comprise:—

"It seems to me that the facts assembled in this book deprive the words—'The French Revolution'—of their equivocal meaning. The same phrase is made to denote both the principles which constitute the French Revolution with the actions consistent with those principles, and the period during which the Revolution was effected with all the actions whether consistent or in contradiction to those principles performed during that period. This confusion was as harmful to the truth as it was useful to the supporters of the retrograde policy, since it allowed one to attribute to the Revolution, considered as a sort of historical personage, the most grievous or even the most anti-revolutionary laws or actions."

These cross and counter-currents M. Aulard has discriminated to the clearing up of much historical confusion.

Dr. Rappoport closes his sketch of the life of "Leopold II., King of the Belgians" (2), with the admission "the late King was a rascal, but he was a clever rascal." According to the Indépendance Belge, in an article written when the rest of the European press was in full cry against Leopold II., the king's cleverness redeemed his rascality: "We must not judge the King by the ethical standard applied to ordinary mortals. He is a great man, an extraordinary man, and such men often shock public opinion and public sentiment." Dr. Rappoport's biography suggests that Leopold's greatness was that of a smart American bagman, who in promoting—incidentally—his employer's interests, has a principal and unprincipled eye to his own. I do not understand Dr. Rappoport's tribute to the King's cynical strength—"like all strong men Leopold II. was no hypocrite"—whereas in Chapter XIX. he admits that the king hoodwinked all Europe by his pretence that his own single interest in the Congo enterprise was that of humanity. "The world applauded his self-sacrifice, and the Congo was abandoned to Leopold the Humane. How he must have shrugged his shoulders and smiled contemptuously at the child-like simplicity of Europe. The Powers fell into the trap of the astute Coburg, and granted him permission to levy duties on imports." Then Leopold the Humane granted concessions to trading companies to collect rubber on the condition that they paid 50 per cent. of their profits to him, and it was no concern of his that these publicans became, what publicans in all ages and countries became, extortioners, or that they enforced their extortion by wholesale mutilation and murder. In this way Leopold II. amassed one hundred and thirty millions of francs, which he bequeathed to his mistress, or rather to one of his many mistresses, the Baroness Vaughan. In this way and also by such sordid savings as wearing old clothes and hats and using, to save washing, but one towel and one pocket-handkerchief per week. Leopold, it might be urged in extenuation, inherited avarice from that exemplary prince, his father, who contrived to save four millions sterling! To be sure in these unsettled days all kings prudently exploit the country which may at any moment expel them. Dr. Rappoport's proof-reader might surely have corrected such odd English as "this constant rumour was aggrandised."

Miss Ella Sykes's "Persia and Its People" (3) is a depressing book, as indeed all books that give a faithful picture of the East inevitably are. It is the usual picture of high-handed oppression and spiritless submission—the one born of the other, a kind of vicious circle from which there seems no escape. Yet perhaps a single happy accident might have redeemed Persia. If the Bab, an enthusiastically-followed preacher of a religion which inculcated love towards all men, equality of the sexes, a universal language, and peace throughout the world, had made good his first miraculous escape, the whole country would have rallied to the standard of a Heaven-sent Messiah. In 1850 he was set against a wall to be shot, but when the cloud of smoke of the volley was dissipated, the Bab had disappeared! The bullets had merely cut the cords which bound him, while the smoke concealed his flight. If he had not been found immediately and done to death successfully, all Persia would probably have been converted to a religion whose founder was so miraculously preserved. Miss Sykes has put into her book an extraordinary amount of information about Persia which is as interesting as it is opportune.

Mr. Arthur Benson in "The Silent Isle" (4) looks still at life through "A College Window" whose light is softened and saddened a little by the mellow, mild, and autumnal staining of its glass. You wonder as you read his essay on a "Book Finished" how he fails to recognise himself in any of his former volumes, crying amazedly as he re-reads them, "Can I ever have thought or felt so?" The reader at least welcomes the same old friend because he is the same, only with "thoughts widened with the process of the suns." Reading his recluse essays is like an escape from the confused and confusing din of London into his own silent isle, "lapsing from a boisterous blare of brass and tinkling string into some delicate economy of sweet melody and gliding chord." How could so fastidious a writer, by the way, allow himself to speak of "aggravating" people?

I have not been fortunate this week in my novels. "The Spider of St. Austin's" (5) is a forcible, feeble tale where the lack of a strong plot and of striking characters is rather emphasised than compensated by a melodramatic style. The stagey last scene reads like a burlesque of a bombastic melodrama. Miss Urquhart's "The Island of Souls" (6) is a much more effective attempt to make the flesh of the reader creep; but she should have taken hints from "Mr. Sludge the Medium" for the appropriate dark setting of her occultism. Even hypnotism, which also plays its part in the novel, needs for its effective presentation to us such an eerie time and scene as Browning describes in his "Mesmerism." Miss Urquhart makes an ineffective attempt to impose her magic upon you in the light of common day and in the company of commonplace people.

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

The most notable event of the publishing season will be the appearance to-morrow of the first volume of the long-expected life of Lord Beaconsfield. Mr. Gladstone died in 1898, and Lord Morley's great biography was given to the world within five years. Lord Beaconsfield died in 1881, bequeathing to his private secretary, Lord Rowton, an immense mass of papers as the material for a biography. Lord Rowton, however, never made any real progress with the heavy task that had been imposed upon him, and after his own death in 1903 the writing of the biography was entrusted to Mr. W. F. Moneypenny. The first volume deals with Disraeli's romantic career down to his election as member for Maidstone in 1837, and as far as possible he is made to tell the story himself through his letters and diary. The biography will be completed in four or possibly five volumes.

A volume entitled "Stories of Society," by Mr. Charles Edward Jerningham ("Marmaduke," of Truth), is announced for publication by Mr. John Long. It will be illustrated with numerous portraits.

In a book entitled "A Fair Quaker: Hannah Lightfoot, and her Relations with George the Third," Miss Mary L. Pendered makes an attempt to penetrate a mystery that has aroused curiosity and speculation for a hundred and fifty years. Miss Pendered deals fully with a subject which has so far received only more or less superficial treatment, and weighs and sifts the evidence for and against the claim made for Hannah Lightfoot that she was legally married to George the Third. The book, which is illustrated with portraits, is being published this week by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett.

Mr. A. M. Broadley's "Napoleon in Caricature," which Mr. John Lane will have ready this week, is a lavishly illustrated work in two volumes, which will appeal to a larger public than most contributions to Napoleonic history. There are between two and three hundred reproductions of contemporary caricatures, twenty-four being full-page illustrations in colour. Dr. J. Holland Rose supplies an introductory essay on pictorial satire as a factor in Napoleonic history.

Another of Mr. Lane's publications this week is "The Foundations of the Nineteenth Century," which is justly described as a unique work in the history of Teutonic literature. Dealing with history, philosophy, religion, and art in the modern world, the book was conceived and written in German by an Englishman, Mr. Houston Stewart Chamberlain, and for ten years past Germans have regarded it as a standard work. It has now been translated into English by Dr. John Lees, and edited by Lord Redesdale, who contributes an introduction.

Since Prescott told the fascinating story of Inca civilisation in his "Conquest of Peru" not a little fresh light has been thrown on the subject, and in a book which Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co. are bringing out this week Sir Clements R. Markham embodies the results of modern researches. Fifty years ago Sir Clements spent much time in Peru, and he has always kept up his knowledge of the literary labours of the Peruvians in the direction of Inca research. His aim has been to make his new work, "The Incas of Peru," interesting to the general reader while offering useful material for the consideration of more serious historical students.

Mr. Gibson Bowles makes a vigorous and lively protest against the Naval Prize Bill in a book entitled "Sea Law and Sea Power," which Mr. Murray is publishing. He argues that it will be suicidal for this country to consent to submit the captures of the Navy in war to the authority of an international prize court at The Hague.

Mr. B. L. Putnam Weale, who is well known as an authority on Far Eastern questions, has a new book, entitled "The Conflict of Colour," appearing through Messrs. Macmillan next week. In it he discusses the relation between the white and coloured races, treating the subject with special reference to the English-speaking peoples.

Early in November Messrs. Jack will bring out the first volume of an important work by Mr. Edwin Foley on "Decorative Furniture." The work will be completed in two volumes, and will contain one hundred plates in colour in addition to over one thousand engravings in the text.

ART.

THE GOUPIL GALLERY SALON.

FROM occupying a few rooms, the Goupil Gallery Salon, now in its fifth year, has expanded from floor to floor until it has appropriated practically the whole of the Goupil Gallery. It is devoutly to be hoped that its promoters will not allow themselves next year, in virtue of a series of successes, to contemplate a large public gallery. For whereas the Salon has gradually risen from the ashes of the New Gallery, and has more than achieved what the New Gallery set out to achieve, its semi-private character has so far preserved it from many of the disadvantages almost inevitable with greater publicity.

In its present stage, which, however precocious, need not necessarily be its maturity, the Salon stands for all the more commendable phases of modern art. Necessarily unacademic, it is no mere inversion of Academicism which, as in the case of some members of the New English Art Club, stands for originality. Nor is it limited either directly or indirectly to any particular school. The fact, however, of its extreme coherence makes it clear that its promoters have hit upon the main current of present-day art, and that that main current is both strong and deep. Mr. Orpen, Mr. Steer, Mr. Nicholson, and Sir Alfred East are well-known names among a large public, but the Goupil Gallery Salon, while including them among its exhibitors, would be well worth a visit for the high average it maintains by means of almost every single unit.

Perhaps, indeed, the high artistic average displayed by the Salon is less noteworthy than the appreciation without which it could have no existence. The beauty of a beautiful woman is non-existent among those who do not appreciate it; art more than anything else is dependent upon the demands made upon it. It is notorious that great patrons have called forth great art; less realised is it that appreciation is half, perhaps even three-quarters, of what constitutes art. How sane this appreciation needs to be can be gathered from the attitude of the average visitor who languishes between extremes of optimism and despair. A plethora of conventional art will lead him to invoke every possible reason to prove the wholesale decay of modern art; a single picture that conveys to him a little home truth will send him into paroxysms of enthusiasm on the rôle new art is playing in the world's progress. The Salon has the advantage of understanding and appreciation; it responds by being, of its kind, the best show in London.

The landscapes as a whole possess all the freedom of the new school from hardened convention, within the limitations of reticence and restraint demanded by that freedom. Admirable water colours of Mr. Walter Russell and Mr. Alfred Rich best illustrate this characteristic. Dover Castle shows all Mr. Russell's depth, forcefulness, and dramatic interest; "Corfe Castle" shows Mr. Rich equally at home with harmony, and repose. To possess either of these pictures would be a pleasure. Delightful, too, is Miss Lily Blatherwick's "Autumn," a Japanese composition of red leaves, spiders' webs, and the tangle of slender vegetation of which she has made a little fairyland. Mr. Charles Cottet's "Mer Bretonne" is typical of the rich sombre coast it represents. Mr. Peppercorn has adopted a somewhat new arrangement of his "Near Porchester." It is unfortunate that he should find salvation in pea soup, but the rich tone and feeling of his work is therefore, perhaps, the greater achievement. I noticed also work by Harpignies, less characteristic than some, by Mr. Cameron, not quite up to his usual level, by Mr. Bertram Priestman, a silvery canvas of early morning, by Mr. Hughes-Stanton, Mr. Wilson Steer, and a number of other painters to whom space forbids me to do justice.

The progress of the portrait-interior is worth noting at the Salon. In Mr. Philip Connard's "Chelsea Interior" it reaches its most ambitious point. The white table-cloth, the lustres, the odds and ends on table and sideboard are here more important even than the three figures, one of which is seen only in the looking-glass. Outside a splash of sunny green finds its counterpart in a bright green skirt, without which the picture would lose half its emphasis. Individually, each object is a "tour de force;" together they have but a semblance of coherence somewhat obviously wrought by the green tones. The famous Van Eyck in the National Gallery has just as many details, but, in spite of all its brilliancy, "A Chelsea Interior" shows confusion of thought and too hard a separateness of the various objects. Mr. Jacque Blanche's interiors, on the other hand, have reduced themselves in one case to a chintz arm-chair, in another to a tea-table. These are the most personal arm-chair and the most personal tea-table I have ever seen. While fully appreciating their merit, it is difficult not to feel a certain regret that M. Blanche, by the triviality of his subject, should lay himself open to misunderstanding, and, further, that his great powers should be subjected to the natural temptation of an arm-chair.

Two portraits stand out in my memory. One is Mr. Orpen's "Bright Morning by the Sea," the other Mr. Nicholson's "Nancy in the Feathered Hat." This last is the least precious of Mr. Nicholson's portraits, and may be considered one of his triumphs. Mr. Orpen's portrait is a variation of his favourite figure in a wind.

Here the extreme delicacy of the modelling, the exquisite workmanship of the scarf, and the flow of the figure show a cessation from the experimentalism in which he indulged after a vast recent output. Mr. Francis James's flowers, Mr. Nicholson's wonderful still-life, "Yellow Orchids," Mr. Arnesby Brown's soft-mouthed cattle, Mr. Walter Bayes's powerful bust of his father, and Mr. Charles Sims's imaginative "Pastorella," are a few more exhibits which should by no means be missed, and which go to prove that, given the circumstances, good art is always forthcoming.

There seems to be some misapprehension as to the continuance of the Town Planning Exhibition at Burlington House, which was opened at the beginning of the conference. The exhibition did not close with the conference, but is remaining open until the end of this week. Those who are at all interested in the many new buildings in London, which mushroom-like, seem almost to spring up in a night, those who are watching developments in Piccadilly Circus, Hampstead, Chelsea, Cannon Street, have here opportunities of arranging their miscellaneous observations as a whole. Further, the strides made by the town planner in every part of the civilised world are here indicated, and comparisons can be made—particularly by means of excellent models—of the various national ways of realising an ideal. The comparisons made daily as to German and English modes of life make of special interest the schemes of the two countries that compete with each other most closely. The credit for the admirable arrangement of the exhibition, rests, I understand, entirely with Mr. Horsfall and Mr. Simpson.

MUSIC.

IT was bound to come. A composer has arisen in Germany who goes far beyond anything yet achieved in point of complexity and incomprehensibility. His name is Arnold Schönberg, and he is a professor of music in Vienna. The most advanced works of Reger, Mahler, and Strauss are, we are told, of classic simplicity compared to Schönberg's creations. A string quartet with vocal accompaniment is spoken of as one of his best works, while he has written compositions also for the piano and for the orchestra. No one, it is said, has at present succeeded in playing any of the former, and the latter are, apparently, rather worse. None the less, Schönberg already has a considerable following, "though whether the new man is a musical fool, swindler, or future holy one," says a caustic German scribe, "remains at present to be determined." Who will be the first to give us something of Schönberg in London?

Was Strauss wise in his generation the other day when he tried to bind the Dresden opera authorities by legal contract to give his "Electra" annually during the next ten years? I am inclined to think so, for further hearing of the work raises considerable doubts as to the likelihood of its continuing to be performed for that length of time on its merits. I question, at all events, if it will ever attain anything like general popularity. Unfortunately, closer acquaintance with the work does not bring greater enjoyment of it. The music remains wonderful enough, of course, in its way, and it contains also some magnificent pages; but the latter are too few to carry off those which are merely crabbed, eccentric, harsh, and generally forbidding. I confess I had imagined at first that it was only a case of getting to know the music sufficiently to like it all, but in point of fact I do not find this to be so. Understanding comes but enjoyment lingers. The difficulties disappear, but the asperities remain. Last Monday's interpreters of the work, however, were in no way to blame, for the performance with Frl. Plaichinger, Frau Mildenburg, Frl. Petzl-Perard, and Mr. Frederick Austin in the leading parts was quite a fine one.

An article in a recent number of the Musical Standard, by Mr. Richard Capell, entitled "A Grumbler's Note on 'Tristan,'" struck a sympathetic chord, probably, in the breasts of a good many readers. The writer laid stress on those various irritating little features forming part of the recognised business of the action which have doubtless worried and annoyed many others besides himself before now—the unsailorlike proceedings of the seamen in the first act, for instance, hauling on meaningless ropes strictly in time with the music. In this respect the writer must expect to incur the lightnings of the Perfect Wagnerite—for this particular "business" is in strictest conformity with the most firmly established Bayreuth traditions. Mr. Capell is audacious enough to condemn in the same spirit Isolde's waving of her scarf in the next act, and to comment with satisfaction on the fact that the Tristan had failed to walk "in step" to the heroic music that heralds his first entrance.

On the other hand he condemns unreservedly the worrying business in the third act of Tristan's coverlet, which the wounded hero is continually half-throwing off and then pulling on again. This has certainly exasperated many others before now, especially when Tristan appears to be wearing merely a nightshirt of decidedly less than the usual length. Years ago a caustic critic remarked that the brevity of the Wagnerian tunics stood in inverse ratio to the length of their speeches, and the contrast holds good to this day. Little details of this sort undoubtedly count for a good deal with the sensitive spectator; and the curious thing is that they are usually accepted with the greatest complacency by the very folks who in regard to other details of far less importance profess themselves overwhelmingly fastidious—to wit, the rabid and fanatical partisans of the Perfect Wagnerite type.

Another season of Promenades has come and gone, and once again the question suggests itself why these delightful concerts should not be continued all the year round. I suppose various difficulties would stand in the way. Even Mr. Wood could hardly endure such a strain—but then a deputy might be engaged. The orchestra, again, are engaged at special rates—but they would certainly be glad of an all-the-year-round engagement. Then the hall is needed for other concerts—but this could be met by building another hall. In short, there seems no real reason whatever why such enjoyable concerts as these should be limited to only ten weeks in the year. Few of the concerts given in their place are anything like so attractive. To have the Promenades always on tap, as it were, would be delightful, and I cannot believe that they would ever lack support. It is the other concerts which would suffer.

The programmes of the past season have been excellent, as usual, and likewise the performances, while, so far as one can tell from casual observation, the attendance seems also to have been quite satisfactory. As regards the novelties heard, none of a very epoch-making character has been produced, but most have been interesting works, revealing, so far as those from native pens are concerned, an ever-improving standard of technique. Dr. Walford Davies's Festival Overture made as powerful an impression as any, Ernst Pauer's Symphony coming next. Bruneau's "L'Attaque du Moulin" suite was hardly a novelty, but had exceptional success. Among the older masters Wagner continues to hold his own, and also, it is pleasant to be able to add, Beethoven. The educational effect of these concerts must be enormous.

As regards other recent concerts, the first of the Queen's Hall and of the London Symphony Orchestras were both enjoyable—the one on Saturday and the other on Monday evening. At the former a set of dramatic dances by Mr. Granville Bantock was an interesting novelty, while at the latter Señor Casal's 'cello playing was, as usual, a feature of note. The vogue which this great 'cellist is now enjoying in London is remarkable. Few instrumentalists within recent years have made such a profound impression, and the fact speaks well for the discernment of the public, for this is a player who never condescends to clap-trap methods, but who gains his ends by the most purely artistic means. Señor Casals was heard likewise at the second of the Classical Concert Society's concerts, when he also played in consummate style.

Your operatic star is notoriously unfortunate and liable to be involved in mishaps of one sort and another, entailing an amount of publicity naturally distressing to these sensitive creatures, and Caruso is certainly no exception to the rule. In one capacity or another he seems to find it absolutely impossible to keep his name out of the news columns. His latest exploit has been apparently to barge into some portion of the scenery while acting in "La Bohème" in Berlin, and as the scenery in question is described as "iron-plated" it is hardly surprising to learn that the result was decidedly unpleasant. Since, however, he appears to have been equal to playing out his part with "his accustomed brilliance," the damages sustained were presumably not too serious. Still, Caruso should be careful. Even an operatic tenor can buy publicity too dearly.

THE THEATRES.

"Count Hannibal," at the New Theatre.

MR. OSCAR ASCHE and Miss Lily Brayton have come back to town, and they have been welcomed royally, as two such well-tried favourites should be. The play in which they have chosen to make their entry is a dramatised version of Mr. Stanley Weyman's story, "Count Hannibal," and the work has been done by Mr. Norreys Connell and Mr. Asche himself. The drama plunges you headlong into the midst of those stormy times when the Catholics in France were convinced that it was best for their country—or, at any rate, best for themselves—that all Huguenots should be put to the sword, and we see poor, half-witted Charles IX. signing the order which is to bring about this desirable consummation. Then the fun begins. That bold dog Count Hannibal de Tavannes (Mr. Oscar Asche) has set his affections on the beautiful Clotilde de Vrillac (Miss Lily Brayton), but Miss Brayton is a staunch Huguenot and Mr. Asche is a sturdy Catholic, and his love for her is only equalled by her loathing for him. Clotilde, being a Huguenot, is, of course, marked down for massacre, and so is her lover, the gay Tignonville (Mr. Ben Webster), and so are all her household. There is only one man can save them, and that is the daring, reckless, swaggering Count Hannibal, but, very naturally, he wants his price, and the price is Clotilde. Make no mistake, Hannibal is quite the gentleman, although a trifle rough in his methods. He will have Clotilde, but it shall be an honourable marriage, and he will even be married by a Huguenot minister to please her. The scene I liked best was that where Count Hannibal and his wife stop at an inn en route for Angers, at which place the lady thinks her husband is going to slaughter all the Huguenots by order of the king. They sleep in different rooms, because this is a mariage blanc—until the lady loves her husband; and just after she has entered his room to steal the papers which order the massacre a crowd of cut-throats, including the pusillanimous Tignonville, come up through a hole in the floor to cut Hannibal's throat. This hole is seemingly the manhole to a drain which the builders of the inn with criminal carelessness have carried past all the bedroom doors. The way in which Hannibal turns the tables on these sewer rats is masterly, and the scene is both thrilling and weirdly picturesque.

You must not go to the New Theatre expecting to meet the intellectual drama, but if you like good, vivid, sensational stuff you will have an excellent time. Mr. Asche has seldom had a part that suits him better than this of the truculent good-hearted Hannibal, and Miss Brayton is very charming as the lady of Vrillac, who is won in so strange a fashion. Much of the time she has to stand still and loathe, but she loathes most picturesquely and statuesquely, and there is much art in standing still well. Poor Mr. Ben Webster cuts rather a sorry figure as the Huguenot lover, but he puts up a fine fight with Mr. Asche—it is one of the best stage fights I have seen—and I liked Mr. Caleb Porter's nefarious priest. He looked like one of the leading lights of the Inquisition. The play is very beautifully mounted and staged, and I should think has come to stay.

"Mrs. Skeffington," at the Queen's.

When you hear a married woman and an unmarried man declaring that they are like brother and sister you may always suspect trouble, and when the wife has a frantically jealous husband, of course, it is the height of unwisdom to keep up fraternal relations. Mrs. Thynne is what I believe Mr. Cosmo Hamilton calls a "fluffy" little woman, and she it is who causes all the trouble in his new play. Colonel Thynne has issued an edict that she is not to be sisterly any more to Major Skeffington, so instead of obeying him she very unwisely goes motoring with him to see his racing stables down in Sussex. Of course, the motor breaks down, and the distraught couple have to spend the night at a country inn miles from telephones and telegraphs. Equally, of course, some one sees them, and Mrs. Thynne with incredible folly says that she is Mrs. Skeffington. This she thinks will save the situation, but it does not; it makes it. Major Skeffington is one of those simple sterling soldiers who are devoted to their profession and never think about marriage or women, except, of course, in a sisterly way, and he is aghast when he hears it blazoned abroad that he has been seen at the Chequers with "his wife." Well, no one dare tell Colonel Thynne the truth. So they all invent lies, which he does not believe, and the fat is in the fire.

This is where Miss Beryl Faber comes in. Long ago, when she was a gawky, brown stockinged cub, she fell in love with Major Skeffington. He did her a service which she has never forgotten, and she never lets us forget it either, because she is continually telling the story. She knows that if Colonel Othello Thynne kicks up a rumpus, not only will there be a nasty scandal, but Major Skeffington will not be recommended to command an expedition, and on this command he has set his heart. Accordingly she hits on a brilliant solution to the problem. "I," she says, "will be Mrs. Skeffington. I will have stayed with you at the Chequers, and so we will save Mrs. Thynne and you." The colonel is quite ready to believe all this at first, but then, alas, he runs up against the indiscreet young man who promptly greets Mrs. Thynne as Mrs. Skeffington, and is ready to swear to the colonel's wife having been the lady of the inn. This is a staggerer for Miss Faber and for everybody. Their stock of lies is now utterly exhausted, so as a last resource Miss Faber, who is the good angel of the piece, has an inspiration. She will tell Colonel Thynne that he is a jealous fool, that his wife loves him and that she loves Major Skeffington, and has acted thus to save him from scandal and ensure his getting the West African command. The colonel believes her, and would you be surprised to hear that Major Skeffington falls genuinely in love with Miss Faber, and that the mock marriage becomes a real one. Assuming that people are to be found who will behave thus strangely I think that Mr. Hamilton has managed his material very deftly. His pictures of life in a cavalry barracks are very bright and entertaining, and much of his dialogue is exceedingly amusing. Two young officers, capitally played by Mr. Charles Vernon and Mr. Robert Averell, particularly amused me, and their love-making with that pretty, but sophisticated, innocent Miss Gwladys Gaynor delighted the house. Mr. Dawson Milward played the major (who suddenly found himself with a wife thrust upon him and rather liked the experience) with that fine seriousness which is always agreeable. The play, indeed, is thoroughly well cast and acted all round, for the women are quite good, namely, Miss Faber as the devoted and capable Kathleen Lindsay and Miss Ellen O'Malley as the worried, fluffy-minded little Mrs. Thynne, who only tells lies because she is afraid to tell the truth, and really, loves her domineering husband. Altogether, "Mrs. Skeffington" is a very good after dinner entertainment. I should add, by the way, that it is preceded by Mr. Frederick Fenn's little low-life study "The Convict on the Hearth," which makes an excellent contrast.

"Between the Soup and the Savoury," at the Playhouse.

Mr. Cyril Maude has revived for a limited number of performances Mr. Austin Strong's pretty fairy tale, "The Toymaker of Nuremberg," and as a first piece there is now played a below-stairs comedy by G. E. Jennings called "Between the Soup and the Savoury." This sets forth very amusingly the attitude of the servants in the kitchen towards the people upstairs whose dinner they are serving. The drama of the piece is concerned with the story of an ill-favoured little kitchenmaid who has annexed certain love letters written to the daughter of the house and invents a lover who has written them to her. She does this because she cannot bear the cook and parlourmaid to think that love has passed her by entirely. Miss Ethel Ross gave a very clever picture of the forlorn little drudge, and the other parts were well played.

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

THE date originally fixed for Ascot races next year (June 20 and three following days) was altered by the Stewards of the Jockey Club, in consequence of their receiving a private intimation that the week selected would be taken up with the Coronation. Ascot was, therefore, brought forward to June 13 and following days. I hear that it is probable that there will be a revision of the dates of some of the other summer meetings. Newmarket First July has been fixed for June 27 and following days, so that it will clash with the Royal Agricultural Society's Show at Norwich, which for special reasons is to be an exceptionally important affair, and the King is President. The only arrangement which could be made to prevent a clashing, which would greatly damage the race meeting, would be to put off the First July until July 4, and it would then be followed a week later by the second summer meeting at Newmarket.

Tuesday next is the last of the great nomination days of the year. Entries will then close for no fewer than eighteen races at Newmarket, including next year's Middle Park Plate and Dewhurst Plate, and the Two Thousand and the One Thousand for 1912. For several years the Stewards of the Jockey Club were urged by Truth to double the nominal endowment of the Middle Park Plate, and at last this step was taken, but the conditions of this historic race require revision, for it is less valuable than the National Breeders' Produce Stakes at Sandown Park or the Imperial Produce Plate at Kempton Park. The entrances amounted this year to £485, so that only £515 had to be drawn from the fund for the added money. The winner received £2,635. The Jockey Club Stakes, which excited no interest whatever, being practically only an exercise canter for Lemberg, cost the fund £842. The liability for an entry in the Middle Park Plate is £25, which is far too much. The conditions of the Two Thousand and the One Thousand, of course, remain unaltered, and there is certainly no reason for changing them so long as these races are so generously supported by owners, in spite of their utterly unattractive pecuniary conditions, each event being a sweepstakes of £100 each, half forfeit, with not a penny of added money. There are six races at Ascot, all with precisely the same conditions as in former years. The programme at Ascot cries out for rigorous revision, but nothing in that line is likely to be undertaken by the somnolent manager of the meeting. At Ascot, where there is abundance of money, every race should be an event with conditions calculated to attract high-class horses. There ought to be only six races each day, and no two races should be on the same lines. The added money at Ascot is at present distributed on no system whatever, and the whole programme is a most chaotic hugger-mugger. The most important races which close on Tuesday are the Biennial and New Stakes for next year, and the Prince of Wales' Stakes and Hardwicke Stakes for 1912. At Goodwood there are five events, including the new T.Y.C. race—the St. George Stakes—with £1,000 added for now two-year-olds and upwards. There are also the Lavant Stakes for next year and the Prince of Wales' Post Sweepstakes (for now foals) for 1912. The events closing for Epsom include the Acorn Stakes of £1,000, to run next year on the Oaks day. At Doncaster there is the Champagne Stakes, and again the minor forfeit for this race (which is not declared until July) is grabbed for the fund. This is a most unwarrantable appropriation, considering the enormous sum which is regularly realised by the race meetings, and the beggarly manner in which the various stakes are endowed. There are seven events (all for now yearlings) at Manchester, and others at Brighton, Lingfield, York, and other meetings. At Newbury there are three £1,000 races, the Autumn Stakes (for now yearlings) and the Ormonde Stakes (for now two-year-olds) to run next year, and the Great Western Stakes (now yearlings) for 1912.

As the English two-year-olds are clearly a moderate lot, there is an excellent chance for French animals in next year's Derby. M. Edmond Blanc has a very smart colt in Lord Burgoyne, and last week another two-year-old of high class was discovered in Baron Maurice de Rothschild's Faucheur, by Perth out of Fourragère, who won the Criterion at Longchamps with the most extreme ease, and he had been highly tried. The success of Faucheur in the Criterion is the more important, inasmuch as the distance was one mile, so it is evident that the colt can stay well. Faucheur had been engaged in the Derby, St. Leger, Eclipse Stakes, and Jockey Club Stakes, and, of course, he is entered for the Grand Prix de Paris. Unluckily Baron de Rothschild's colt was withdrawn on March 29 from all his English engagements except the St. Leger.

I have remarked several times on the slovenly handicapping which has become so scandalously common during the last few years. Handicapping appears to be a lost art, so far as the doodles who are known as "the triumvirate" are concerned, and nearly every owner or trainer has some example for record of their ludicrous incompetence. Two of the placed horses in the Cesarewitch carried penalties for races which they had won since the weights were published. Buckwheat had been ridiculously underestimated in the Duke of York Stakes. Bronzino's weight in the Cesarewitch was the subject for weeks of general complaint, and the result of that race proved clearly that if another stone had been added to Verney's original weight Mr. Neumann's horse would nevertheless have won easily. Handicappers must treat horses on their best form, and when a once smart animal has been in retirement for a time he ought not to be weighted as a plater when he reappears on the Turf.

Since Lemberg has won a couple of races at Newmarket one has heard a deal of muddy-minded drivel about his losing the St. Leger, as it appears to be thought that "he ought to have won." One knows no more about Lemberg now than one knew before Doncaster, as he had nothing to beat in either of the races at Newmarket, and it was simply inconceivable that he would be defeated there. We shall have to wait until the Ascot Cup to see how this season's three-year-old form turns out, but no doubt Lemberg will be previously seen out in the Coronation Cup at Epsom if all goes well with him. I fully expect that Nuage will win next year's Gold Cup if he is as well as he was on the day that he carried off the Grand Prix.

There are only thirty-four entries for the Knowsley Nursery of £1,000 at Liverpool, and this race would have done worse but for the support of Lord Derby, who has engaged five. I have sometimes remarked that owners move in mysterious ways, and it is curious to find nearly as many entries for the £500 Nursery, and the Anchor Nursery of only £200 has obtained thirty-one! The Chesterfield Nursery of £1,000 at Derby, which is, perhaps, the most popular race of this class, has only forty-two entries, but at the same meeting forty-five two-year-olds have been engaged in the Osmaston Nursery of £500! The Chesterfield entry includes several good two-year-olds, notably Cyllius, Mary Carmichael, Night Rider, Knockfeerna, St. Anton, Romeo, Canvas-back, Black Potts, and Joie de Vivre. Only thirty-seven horses have been entered for the Derby Cup of £1,500, the most notable of the lot being Dibs, Buckwheat, Declare, Highness, Rosedrop, Elizabetta, Willonyx, Rathlea, Verney, Columbus, Last Call, Glacier, and Apache.

Pietri will not run for the Dewhurst Plate, and his next appearance is to be in the Two Thousand if all goes well with him. Seaforth is also engaged in the Two Thousand, and both colts are entered for the Newmarket Stakes a fortnight later, and they may meet again in the St. Leger.

The official Free Handicap of the two-year-olds was published on Thursday, St. Nat being at the top with 9 st., while next came Seaforth and Pietri (8 st. 13 lbs. each), Nicola, 8 st. 9 lbs., and then Borrow, Prince Palatine, St. Anton, and Sunstar, each with 8 st. 8 lbs. Prince Palatine ought certainly to have been placed on an equality with Seaforth and Pietri, and Alice and Invicta appeared considerably too low with 7 st. 12 lbs. each. I should fancy that Nerestan (7 st. 8 lbs.) will win this race if he goes for it, and in his absence Invicta may be successful if she runs. I am told that Alice is not likely to run again this year. The Newmarket Biennial is her first engagement as a three-year-old, and she is entered for the One Thousand, as also is Invicta.

There were thirty-six acceptances for the Sandown Foal Stakes, but the field collapsed direfully, there being only four starters, and the race was a ridiculous farce. Odds of 100 to 7 were betted on Lemberg, who merely trotted for a mile, and then he cantered away from Louvigny, to whom he was giving a stone. If one is to judge the Derby winner from the style in which he has usually been ridden by Maher, it is clear that he must be regarded as a non-stayer by his jockey and trainer. It is curious that Brancepeth was a great Newmarket tip for this race, and it was confidently expected there that Lemberg would find it difficult to give 27 lbs. to Lord Durham's gelding, who jumped round at the start and threw his jockey, whom be kicked. This was Brancepeth's first appearance on a racecourse, but in the spring he was mentioned by people who knew nothing whatever about him as likely to turn out the best of Lord Durham's three-year-olds. He is a gelding by Gallinule out of Hackler's Pride, and he cost 1,700 guineas as a yearling.

There was a splendid entry for the Great Sapling Plate, but only six two-year-olds ran, and betting was confined to Seaforth and Knockfeerna. The colt won in a common canter, while the filly did not appear to run kindly, but it is possible that she had been chopped at the start by Seaforth. This performance confirms me in the opinion which I expressed last week about the Middle Park Plate, i.e., that Seaforth ought to have won that race. The lamentations over the omission of Seaforth from the Derby entry may turn out to have been premature, as some good judges are of the opinion that Mr. MacCalmont's colt will prove to be deficient in stamina next season.

The Hook Plate was won with the most extreme ease by Stedfast, who is a colt of great promise, and he appears capable of enormous improvement during the next six months. He was bred by the late Lord Derby, and he is by Chaucer out of Be Sure (dam of Cocksure II. and Decision). His name is singularly felicitous, the spelling being the same as Chaucer's own in the "Ballade" which he wrote on the accession of King Richard. Stedfast is heavily engaged next season, and Lord Derby seems to hold an excellent chance of winning some of the classic races, having this colt, King William, and Hair Trigger II. Stedfast was highly thought of as a yearling, and he was entered then for nearly fifty races.

Bayardo will not run again, and he goes to the stud next season, his subscription for 1911 being full at 301 guineas, which is an exorbitant fee for an untried horse, but if owners of mares are ready to pay such prices, then owners of sires are quite right to demand them. It is curious to recall the fact that St. Simon's fee for his first season at the stud was 50 guineas, and the charge for Isonomy was either 50 guineas or 70 guineas.

There will be racing next week at Birmingham, Newbury, Lingfield, and Doncaster. The best sport will be at Newbury, but there are sure to be large fields everywhere. Phaleron may win the Newbury Autumn Handicap.

THE GOLF AMATEUR DEFINITION.

The delegates for the amateur golf championship meet in Edinburgh next month. They will have to consider the definition of the amateur golfer. The rules of golf committee has deputed to Messrs. Low, Hutchinson, and Fowler the task of evolving a definition. It is said that these modern Moseses will define a professional and

PIANOLA PIANO

Gives to all the musical pleasures once enjoyed only by the few.

MANY people do know—and everyone ought to know—that the Pianola Piano (Steinway, Weber or Steck Piano) is the Piano which can immediately make skilled musicians of us all. By means of the Metrostyle and Themodist and other unique features, the Pianola Piano gives even to the novice full and complete mastery of expression. It is this fact that has earned for the Pianola the approbation of nearly all the world's great musicians—to the exclusion of all other instruments claiming to make the same musical results possible. If you call at Æolian Hall or write for Catalogue "T.T." you will be certain that it is really the Pianola Piano you are investigating, and not one of the instruments of similar nature which fails to reach the artistic standard set by expert musicians.

say that anybody else is an amateur. The existing definition provides that an amateur is one who has never made for sale golf clubs, balls, or any other article connected with the game, nor carried clubs for hire after fifteen years of age, nor received any consideration for having played in a match, nor for a period of five years prior to September 1, 1886, received a money prize in open competition. Now it may be taken for granted that making clubs, and balls and other articles will go by the board. A genuine amateur may well employ people to do these things. Times are changed. The merchant and manufacturer of golfing implements makes money. It is a business for gentlemen. From what has appeared in the press it is pretty certain that Golf Illustrated will no longer be able to enjoy its own pet definition of the word consideration and give hysterics to lady amateurs whose expenses are paid when they play for their county. It will not be able to tell them that they are no longer amateurs, while they are not professionals, but simple-minded maidens in a state of semi-animated suspense. The simple methods of the sub-committee will be to say that any one who has carried clubs for hire after sixteen years of age or has played or taught golf for money is a professional and all the rest are amateurs. So be it. But there is the money. Does a man who plays for a club sweep play for money? Does the man who plays for a wager play for money? Does the man who goes half with the buyer of his name at the sweepstake auction play for money? A London club provided a bigger sum than the professionals play for, and this sum, raised at the auction, was played for by amateurs. This sweeping definition will not do. The amateur must still be allowed to bet and to win sweeps, but he must not be something on to nothing. That would never do.

Well, the words that shall except all such things are not for me to frame. But the compilers of the definition must be careful. Another Travis may arise, one who neither bets nor ever plays for money. A sort of Young Men's Christian Association Travis with money made out of a Beef Trust, whose principles forbid him to drink, smoke, or gamble. Well, such an one might enter and win, because he would disqualify all his opponents who had played for money. There would be our silly rule. He would have entered under our rules. The American Press would go fairly mad on the subject. One must be careful in these matters. And, further, the trio must really consider what nerve shattering shocks such an ill-drawn definition would give to the editor of Golf Illustrated. Play for money, of course you do, if your fare is paid publicly and not privately. You could not play without the money, if you could you would not have taken the money. Fares are money. You are a professional, the paper would screech, and—well, one might be amused, but the whole business will have to be gone over again and a fresh definition will have to be evolved. These legislative changes are very trying to simple-minded folk. Wherefore the modern Moseses will do well to copy the example of the Moses primæval, who delivered his decalogue amidst some of the finest sand bunkers in the world. It will be recalled that he told the people what they were not to do. Likewise the legislative triumvirate should tell us more clearly and concisely what the amateur may not do. The definition will be a penal one. If he does not do what he ought to do he will not be an amateur. That is enough. There is no need to call him a professional if he does not become one. The professional golfer is a man occupying an honourable position in the golfing world. To call a caddie over sixteen years of age a professional is an absurdity, on the face of it. The loafer who gets an odd job and does not know one club from another becomes a professional because he has got a job as a caddie. This is ridiculous, and it may well cause annoyance to the properly called professional.

Legislators must not be too foolish in their efforts. They often are. Wherefore let these men who hold the status of the golf club world in their hands act warily. Let those who break the rules cease to be amateurs, but do not call them what they are not and probably never can be—professionals. Everything will depend on how the money question is treated. Golf is played for money, it is a medium for open-air gambling. It has taken the place of the heavy gaming with dice and cards in which our forebears indulged. The sums that are played for amongst certain classes of players are considerable. But there is little chance of bleeding young fools. The youthful mug must be left to the turf. Golf is a game that teaches any one outside a lunatic asylum the true measure of his own incompetency. Wherefore fortunes and estates do not pass on a drive or a putt as they did, and perhaps do, on a cut of a pack of cards. But the simple, solid fact remains that amateurs do play for money, be the stakes large or small, and so it will continue. There is no harm done. But it is fatuous for legislators to pretend that amateurs do not do these things and to evolve meaningless definitions about money and playing for money which are contradicted by every-day experience.

It would really seem as though the lessons taught by the New Zealand Rugby team some years were at last bearing fruit. A new generation of footballers, brought up from their earliest days at our public schools in the new passing game, show a development in attack. And at the same time defence has not been neglected. Then the necessity for fast and hard-working forwards, strenuous shovers in the scrimmage, able to break up smartly to get at the man with the ball, and, above all, capable of passing themselves, has been realised. Nor is the game waning. Over six thousand people went to Twickenham to see the Harlequins beaten by the Services by a goal to nil. The losers were the attackers. The defence of the Service with Lyon at back was superb. And on the same day at Portsmouth the Services were giving the London Irish a beating. Our officers in both Services keep themselves splendidly fit. The O.M.T.s were not at full strength forward against Oxford, and their crack half, Cheeseman, was playing for the University. He should be certain of his Blue. Both sides scored freely, and the Oxford defence will have to be a bit more accurate. Cambridge won easily against the Old Leysians, but the defence was none too sound. The freshmen look like supplying sound halves and three-quarters. The fetish of the midget half should be a thing of the past. Richmond probably surprised themselves by beating the Scottish soundly, and Blackheath only lost to Bristol by a point, while Rosslyn Park ran London Hospital to a try. All of which things show there is plenty of good Rugby football in and around the metropolis.

At Cambridge University athletics—meaning thereby the sports for which a running blue is given—seem to be in a bad way. College meetings have lost popularity. An effort at revival is to be made. A scheme has been propounded which can do no harm and may do good. Two colleges are to hold their sports on the same afternoon and at the same time. The winners in the scratch races are to score points. The winners in this round run in the next round, for there will be a draw amongst all the colleges, and then as a grand flare-up, the final will be decided between four colleges. For the purposes of scoring, five points score for a win, and three, two, and one for the next three places. The winning college is to hold the challenge cup for the year. It is, of course, unpleasant to reflect that athletics have fallen into such disrepute at the university. It may be that in this mechanical age a quarter in fifty is not fast enough for the average undergraduate. But runners, like rowing men, have to train, and there are so many Blues when a man need not train.

* * * * * *

In the Billiard Control Club Championship Inman showed a great improvement in his game. Stevenson just got going in time to win. It needed a great effort, and the Lord Chief Justice, in presenting the cup, praised the good sportsmanship of both players. Both deserved all he said.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

MOTOR owners who groan at their tyre bills will be glad to hear that the Royal Automobile Club propose to hold a trial of the various spring wheels and similar devices at present on the market. The number of these is much more numerous than is generally supposed, but not one of them has at present succeeded in securing anything like general popularity. Take a census of the first thousand cars encountered on the road, and 999 of them at least will probably be shod with pneumatics. It does not follow, however, that some substitutes which have been devised are not worth at least a good deal more attention than they have hitherto received, and such an R.A.C. trial as that proposed should serve a useful purpose. A run of a thousand miles on the road is to be one of the conditions of the trial, while each entrant will be required to supply a vehicle of the weight, etc., compatible with the design of his wheels. Of these two conditions the latter seems less satisfactory than the former, since the more obvious arrangement would be to test each device on chassis of uniform weight. But as nothing has yet been definitely decided these conditions may undergo revision in the event of the trial actually taking place.

The recent abortive strike in Paris served to illustrate once more in a very remarkable fashion the utility of the car as a substitute for the railway. Without talking of the motor-car eventually supplanting the locomotive altogether, there is no doubt that it is proving itself a more and more dangerous rival as time runs on. Thousands of motor owners nowadays never use the railway train at all except for the longest journeys, and the process can only be extended in the course of time. No wonder that the railway companies themselves have long since realised what a danger confronts them, and that they are one and all adopting the wise course of making terms with the enemy by pressing it into service on their own account.

Some one has been suggesting once again that the usefulness of the warning triangles on the road might be materially increased by adding features to indicate more definitely the nature of the particular danger or cause for caution—such as a short bar in continuation of the base of the triangle for a sudden turn, continuation of the base on both sides to indicate cross roads, and so on. The suggestion is plausible enough. Certainly it would be an advantage sometimes to know exactly what a warning meant, and in France such detailed signs are already in use with good results. It would be a still more useful reform if half the existing signs were taken down altogether, leaving in existence those only which indicate a really serious cause for caution. As it is, it is not infrequently difficult to determine why a given sign has been put up at all. Then the inevitable happens. Familiarity breeds contempt, and drivers end by assuming that one and all are negligible.

Taxi drivers look like being hoist with their own petard, and incidentally the public will suffer, too. There is little doubt that the proposal of the companies to increase the fares is due in part at least to the fact that a considerable proportion of the earnings which should come to them is filched by the drivers in the form of unrecorded extras and so on. In the result, with competition always increasing, they are beginning to feel the pinch, and propose accordingly to adjust matters by putting up prices. This, however, does not appeal to the men at all, and so they are fighting tooth and nail against it, on the plea that their tips will fall off if the proposal is adopted. I do not quite follow the argument, which credits the average cab user with a good deal more strength of character than he usually possesses. He may, however, take taxis less freely, but in this case the companies would suffer even more than the men. Considering the ordinary cost of upkeep, I should have thought that eightpence per mile would yield a fair profit in the case of light cars travelling on such good surfaces as the ordinary London streets, especially considering the enormous economies naturally effected in the case of a large number of cars run under one ownership. At the same time, it is certainly something of a paradox that a taxi is actually cheaper for a short journey than a hansom, since the latter gets his minimum shilling as against the eightpence or tenpence of the former. The proper arrangement would exactly invert this state of things, and the speedy taxi would then be paid for at a higher rate than its slower-going rival; this would have the incidental advantage of helping the latter not a little, since many people not pressed for time would be glad to take a hansom instead of a taxi if they economised thereby. As it is, one loses in doing this at present both in time and in pocket—an absurd state of things.

All motorists know that Messrs. Humbers, Limited, are one of the most enterprising and up-to-date of British firms, and it needs only to take stock of the cars encountered on the road to realise the high favour which their wares enjoy with the public. Seeing is believing, however, and a party of pressmen and others who recently had an opportunity of paying a visit to the works of the company at Coventry, at the invitation of the board, had every reason to realise the truth of the adage. The immense works, covering an area of over twenty-two acres, are among the largest and best equipped of their kind in existence, and inspection of the methods of working in progress suggested readily enough the nature of the means whereby the company is enabled to place on the market such excellent cars at such moderate prices. "Thorough" and "method" would seem to be the inspiring watchwords which have been adopted, and they have certainly served the company well. Four four-cylinder four-speeded cars, ranging from about 8-h.p. to 20-28-h.p., comprise the company's models for 1911, about which I shall have more to say in due course in dealing with the coming show.

One by one the leading Continental firms are finding it desirable to establish themselves in London, the latest being the Delaunay-Belleville Company, which has acquired fine premises in Pall Mall in close proximity to the palatial new quarters of the R.A.C. Repair works and coachbuilding shops have also been provided, and owners of Delaunay-Belleville cars are invited to avail themselves freely of the new facilities at their disposal, as it is the company's desire to keep in touch as closely as possible with their customers, and in this way to promote still further the popularity of cars whose fine qualities have, of course, long since been recognised by English motorists.

The Royal Automobile Club has taken a step which should certainly appeal to its members in arranging with certain of the leading insurance companies a special policy available to its members and associates at reduced rates. The club will undertake also to represent them in the case of claims—itself a very solid advantage, since the most skinflint company would be likely to think twice before trying any hanky-panky tricks in the case of a claim preferred by such a valuable client as the R.A.C. with its thousands of members.

The recent article in the Autocar by a writer described as the "Chief Engineer of a leading firm of makers of poppet valve engines," reopening the slide-valve controversy, has drawn an amusing reply from Mr. Charles Y. Knight, the proud progenitor of the sliding sleeve principle. Mr. Knight affects to believe that the critical article must have been a dark device on the part of Mr. Instone, of the Daimler Company, to renew controversy on the subject with a view to demonstrating once again in the result the superiority of the valve which he pretends to condemn. Failing this hypothesis, he suggests that Mr. Royce, of Rolls-Royce, Limited, had occurred to him as a possible author, but he dismisses this assumption on the ground that this eminent engineer could not possibly have made such statements as those contained in the article in question. Altogether, the article makes several pages of excellent fooling—which do not fail to include also plenty of effective pleading on behalf of the particular valve system with which the writer's name is identified.

REVOLUTION ON THE ROAD.

(As regards the situation in Portugal, let us hope that the new form of Government will pay more attention to the roads than the old did.—Car.)

Let red Revolution sweep over the land;
Let crowns tumble down in the dust;
Let kings from the throne they had fancied their own
Be chased in surprise and disgust;
I care not how painful such incidents are Provided they bring better roads for my car.

Let barricades swiftly spring up in the streets,
And cannon belch forth fiery shot;
Let brother for brother all sentiment smother
And strive each the other to "pot";
I'm utterly careless what slaughter transpires
So long as it brings better roads for my tyres.

Let priests suffer blows at the hands of the mob,
Let nuns fall unconscious with fright,
Let bishops, and rectors, and vicars, preceptors,
And novices mingle in flight;
For me, the whole Church may be razed to the ground
If the roads for my motor less trying are found.

Then, vive Revolution! where'er it arise—
Its tragical side I ignore;
I'm a motorist and I value a land
By the state of its roads—nothing more;
Fire, famine, and slaughter are sad, I confess,
But all's well if they render the gradients less.

WOMAN.

LETTERS TO MY MOTHER-IN-LAW.

DEAR Mrs. P,—James has been asked at his club to join a corps of young bravoes who have decided to re-seat King Manuel on his throne. The idea occurred to several of the most beautiful young members at once—at least, I have their authority for saying so—but it was actually voiced, I believe, by a scion of the house of Crespigny. I am glad to say, however, that I have convinced James what a mistake the whole thing would be, and he has promised to give it up. He was very much disappointed, and I persuaded him to join the "Tuesday Society" as an excuse for backing out at the last minute. Ostensibly the Tuesday Society is a series of lectures, Lord Shaw and Mr. Yeats being this season among the speakers. Really, however, it supplies a long-felt want. The pleasure-seeker—I use the word in its modern technical sense—finds in the hour after dinner opportunity for relaxation and repose; the accomplished linguist now and again has opportunity for proving his mettle by laughing in the right place at jokes in a foreign tongue. I have warned James that Homeric laughter a second too late merely gives you away. I remember a lecture by M. Bouvier on Henri Lavedan, in which he told the story of the French Academy's intention of making Lavedan a member. Hearing of the intended honour, Lavedan took time by the forelock and advertised himself before the preliminaries were fulfilled as "Membre d'Académie." On a severe protest by the immortals he altered his advertisement to "Henri Lavedan (pas encore) Membre d'Académie." M. Bouvier paused and waited for laughter that was not forthcoming. Then, giving a leading guffaw, himself, he evoked peals that gave the room away. If the occasion arises I shall nudge James a second beforehand.

Mr. Henry James once spoke at the Tuesday Society. He is an excellent speaker and an expansive conversationalist if somewhat deliberate in manner. I was present at a dinner party at which he and the then President of the Dilettanti Society were guests. The President had a lightning wit and a warehouse of stories which he was singularly successful in not repeating to the same people. Every time Mr. James opened his mouth the President, so to put it, jumped in, and Mr. James spent his evening opening and shutting his mouth in silence. On his departure his hostess thanked him for promoting a brilliant evening. I do not advise Anna to ask him to write his name in her copy of his new book; he is so good-natured as to suffer a good deal from importunity. If she really admires him she should read all his later works, of which some one said you count the "nots" in his sentences to see whether they are positive or negative.

I was sorry to be out the day you and the five girls came up to the "hostels for women" conference, but I had already arranged to go down to the Crystal Palace to see to Sin Tin's blue curtains in readiness for the Kennel Club Show on the morrow. I am sorry, for the sake of the Kennel Club, to say that, although the best Chow there, he did not get a prize. As a matter of fact, if you are a woman exhibitor, it is really better to show the largest possible dog—a Borzois or a Great Dane at least. Wearing a long workman-like holland coat to show you're in business, and very patent shoes and coloured silk stockings to show you're not, you allow the largest possible dog to try your slender strength in the judging ring by tugging you along, "Diana-of-the-Uplands" fashion. Personally, I have always taught Sin Tin to go to heel, but the effect of Diana on the judges, an they be men, is perfectly irresistible. I imagine that half the Kennel Club skirmishes arise from the fact that too many irresistible women apply at once, with the result that somebody has to be sacked somehow to relieve the circulation.

I sometimes wonder, dear Mrs. P., whether, with the best of intentions, you did not make a mistake in urging my-father-in-law to make James a barrister instead of Director of the "Blottingham Boots." Nobody minds trade nowadays, provided it produces a sufficiently big income, and it is just as easy to sustain a select idleness as a director as at the Bar. Also, knowing my father-in-law as I do, I fear that his yielding to your ambitions may have been based on an unfair sense of James' incapacity. However, I have been urging James to go down next week to Walthamstow to work for Sir John Simon. Everybody is going; some, because it looks well for young barristers with a future in the future to work for the Solicitor-General; some from mere Liberalism; most because, in spite of the stress of the election, Sir John answered their congratulations by return of post with his own hand. When you remember that Sir John is personally conducting the Solicitor-Generalship and the Walthamstow election, the answering of a thousand or two congratulations on his promotion is really touching, though it seems a little inconsiderate to future Tory office-holders to set strenuous precedents which they cannot in their heart approve.

I often wonder what Ireland will find to do, once her grievances are removed. I imagine, however, that she will no longer be put to the trouble taken by the Hon. William Gibson at the opening of the Gaelic Fair at the Horticultural Hall, of learning French to address an English audience which doesn't understand Irish. I rather wish my father-in-law would push Home Rule more vigorously either by selling only brogues in the "Blottingham" or by employing only brogues in the various branches—I suppose, by the way, that tongue-splitting is the connection between "brogue" the shoe, and "brogue" the accent—it is becoming so expensive to buy shamrock tea-cosies and Irish homespuns from half one's friends at double their value; and as I don't care for homespuns whatsoever, and as his own tailor won't make up extraneous stuffs, James can't wear them all out. Also it is tiring to keep up one's Irish sympathies consistently; I sing the "Pratie Song" whenever I'm asked, and only financial stress prevented me from buying Irish linen and a poplin tie for James at the Fair. But it is discouraging to be told, when you have cultivated a brogue, that it's the wrong one, that the green you're wearing doesn't suit you, and that though your eyelashes are long and dark, and your "colleen" bazaar-dress straight from Ireland, you look a mere Sassenach. I'm going to be aggressively English for a change.

If the girls are really anxious to do something striking, they would be quite in the swim if they started a health-caravan. My father-in-law might lend them the van he uses for temperance propaganda—or is it Bibles, and I dare say I could get Lady Helmsley to christen it for them. She would do anything for hygiene. The last time I saw her in public was at Olympia, where she was showing her hygienic crêche. It is very like a grown-up doll's house—hygienic chairs, tables, bottles, cots—even hygienic babies who feed, sleep, play, and howl hygienically. Some of the cots are made of banana crates—so cheap as to be a strong inducement to the lower classes to save by swelling the population. But the caravan is most satisfactory, at least if you don't mind chicken every day; they are the only things that grow on the particular spot where you happen to stop. I dare say they know, by the way, that chickens in a natural state have both feathers and insides. Hygiene itself seems to me to have one very great advantage. It may make them talk shop—I mean to their friends as well as to the proletariat; it may make them think in germs and judge their neighbour by the number of her unopened windows; it may even cause them to assure themselves personally that she is not using her new bath-room for a coal hod, and make them a little uncharitable towards the drunk, the dirty, and the dissolute, who, after all, are their equals in the sight of Providence; but it does for once get away from the deserving poor, and provide occupation and amusement for that much neglected class, the idle rich. Universal health is all very well as an ideal, but were it realised, it is dreadful to think of how many of our friends would be thrown out of a very harmless employment—

Your loving daughter-in-law,

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Sunday.—Joan prevailed, and bore me off to Brighton with all the pomp and circumstance attendant on the eleven o'clock train. A castle in the air despatched across the Atlantic could scarcely excite more fuss and officialdom. Burdened with a handful of tickets, as full of complicated instructions as the famous Form 4, Nita and I faced the gold-laced guardians of the barrier to meet with a peremptory refusal to her proposal to speed her parting relative from the platform. Offers of her purse and her vaccination and marriage certificates were alike rejected when tendered in guarantee of her strictly honourable intentions.

Thus, uncheered I started. Joan having carefully recognised me as the invalid, carefully selected for herself the most comfortable seat in the corner of the long divan facing the engine. She steadfastly remained deaf to my appreciation of its superiority, and at the same time blind to the vicinity of that couple of much romance, Robert Loraine and Marie Löhr, who looked like a complete Christmas number of charms in her ermine toque and tie, while her companion seemed definitely appreciative of this fact.

The two blouses at Brighton.

Finally we arrived, and Joan, still regardless of my delicate condition, drove me up to the Green at Hove and commanded me to march about with the multitude. We met many odd little damsels being led by odd little dogs, and saw not a few examples of the pot hat worn with the trouser skirt, and one excellent costume of striped corduroy velveteen, with a huge fox muff and boa of a superlative quality which suggested that they had just escaped from the International Fur Store. There was a glorious golden sun shining on a tender chrysoprase sea, and the bath chairs were mainly inhabited by the young of both sexes, while the elders of the community walked swiftly and energetically until there sounded the tocsin of their soul, the luncheon bell.

Inside the Métropole there was a crowd, and outside at least twenty motors were drawn up in dusty, evil-smelling line. The least observant could note an enormous improvement in the garments worn by the goddesses in the cars. A huge fur coat discarded showed the neatest figure in vellum-tinted cloth with a small fur cap enveloped in an ivory tinted gauze veil. A moleskin coat was worn with an open brimmed bonnet—an improved edition of the early Victorian shape with a pendant veil of mole-coloured chiffon; and a grey squirrel coat lined with white and grey squirrel was thrown aside to reveal a tightly fitting princess dress of grey cloth which was crowned with a small grey hat of stitched suède.

After lunch I was driven to Rottingdean, where the sky grew rapidly grey and I grew rapidly cold, and the yawns of Joan rent the air, so that in completest sympathy I urged her home to a pre-prandial nap.

We met "Frank Danby" in the lift coming down to dinner. She was talking volubly to another woman, obviously a younger sister of far, far gentler mien. The brilliant authoress was inveighing against her critics. It is a pity they did not go to school together, for she does not seem to like their geography any better than they like her grammar. She was contemptuously protesting that in writing of the scenes laid in Siam one offender had located them in Burma and another in Ceylon.

But, whatever her elementary education may have lacked as a finished product she must be hailed expert in the art of dress. She was wearing a soft black satin gown of indisputable virtues, darned in patches with iridescent blue bugles, the bodice having a large empiècement of closely run bugles, intersected here and there with moonstones. It was filled to the throat with pale blue chiffon, lightly covered with very fine black net, and her small, neatly coiffed head was encircled with two ropes of blue bugles fastened at one side with a cabochon. Every one emerging from the lift arranged her hair in the glass, and, recognising the man in charge as an old friend who bears a most remarkable resemblance to the king of the caterers, I questioned:

"Does any woman ever leave the lift without glancing in the mirror?"

"No, nor man either," he replied, with treacherous frankness.

Wednesday.—Brighton has done its work, as usual, and I am almost my normal self and craving for London. In the meantime, having admired rapturously some blouses in a shop window, we went in and ordered two others entirely different. The shops at Brighton are always worthy, and both these models deserved patronage. One was of pale grey shawl-patterned chiffon, trimmed with wide coarse braids, dark grey, outlined with fine gold and grey braid, and fastened down one side with small gold buttons. The other, greedily snatched by me—for I welcomed it as being as simple as new—had a long shoulder piece of clematis-mauve crêpe de chine piped on to full sleeves, which, with the under-bodice, were made of peacock blue chiffon, bordered by bands of dark purple velvet. I propose having the lace sleeves elongated to the wrist, since short sleeves in a day dress may be written down as amongst the dressy objects of my unadulterated scorn.

We visited the Autumn exhibition at the picture gallery this afternoon, and returned to the hotel to find a telegram from Diana telling me that she starts for Paris Friday, and I must meet her at Charing Cross. Thus do the well-laid schemes of mice and Joan become frustrated, and I decide to complete my convalescence in town whilst ruefully remembering that my wardrobe even as my banking account might be labelled "No effects."

Thursday.—Virginia offered to shop with me, and as is usual with Virginia spent most of the morning claiming my attention whilst she shopped for herself. She cultivates egotism to the pitch of perfection. However, I suffered in a good cause at Sykes, Josephine, 280, Regent Street, where the promised land of reduced inches is most truly and comfortably attained under the clever counsel of the high priestess, who has more than a casual acquaintance with human anatomy combined with a becoming sense of fashion. The Kruboid corset has a remarkably good influence on redundancies, and is yet thin and comfortable to wear. Its straps are in the right place, and its shape above the waist gives an outline even to the most clumsy figure. The Supreme had the privilege of Virginia's patronage, and is to be made for her specially of the finest white silk coutille. It is just the right length to do honour to the new frocks, is firm without being stiff, and imparts a pliable contour far more attractive than the boarded-in-aspect of the ordinary expensive corset of commerce. Whilst waiting I sampled some excellent underclothing for motoring and sport, and appreciated the conveniences of the Tatnette jupon, a skirted garment woven in silk or wool or spun silk.

In the evening I celebrated my return to health by taking Robert to see "Grace" at the Duke of York's. The title was threefold justified, and Lillah McCarthy's gown of crimson and gold brocade veiled with black chiffon should serve as a model for many middle-aged, whilst the old should note the generous folds of Lady Tree moire costume and the reticent advantages of her lace neckwear; and the young and slim may safely copy the fur-bordered green chiffon tunic of Irene Vanbrugh, whose coiffure as ever speaks the first and last word of sleek elegance. I counted myself too weak to go out to supper, and left Robert more or less disconsolate over this and my departure to Paris, promising to return in time to go to the League of Mercy's special matinée of "The Dollar Princess," which takes place at Daly's on November 3.

Friday, Paris.—Diana pretended she had decided it quite suddenly à l'impréu but it has really been her project for some weeks. She disclosed the cause in her own inimitable way: "I haven't a rag to wear, I must see Paris—and buy."

We were a party of four, and her tame resident Marquis de V—— met us at the gare, when I took much comforting thought in the thickness of my brown chiffon veil, being depressingly convinced that travelling is not among my most becoming circumstances, and having felt some little modesty in face decoration in company.

We left the others to worry about with the luggage, and drove straight to the Ritz. Diana has tried every hotel in Paris, and always goes back to her early impression that the garden suite at the Ritz is the ne plus ultra of quiet and comfort, and therefore just good enough for her.

And now I lounge at length, not so much as I could wish, in front of a gay little fire, and I await my armour for the evening's encounter with woman's best friend—amusement.

Mrs. A.'s Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

Fan-tail.—It would not be possible for me to give you a special sketch. I like your notion of a lemon-coloured tunic, and this would look its very best hemmed with skunk, or sable. But if this suggestion should be too expensive, then border with a band and fringe of bugles; the top should be cut round, the sleeves in one with the bodice, and the belt of satin like the skirt and fastened at one side with a floral device made of yellows and golds of different tones. Yellow pearls might be substituted for the bugles if you prefer these.

E. B.—I will answer your letter privately by post; much will depend upon the quality of the work and the price.

Japanese J.—Of course, the International Fur Store would re-arrange that coat for you. I expect it will require some added to achieve that new sleeve; but you could omit the border round the hem, and have your own sable boa fixed as collar. 163, Regent Street is the address, and you will not find their charges at all high, and only the best workmanship could contrive that alteration with complete success.

SEAL v. RABBIT.

(The London Chamber of Commerce suggests that rabbit-skin furs should be sold as sealskins, under certain permissible names.)

Would rose, I ask, smell half so sweet
With nomenclature funny,
Or, thus unfairly christened, meet
The bees' demand for honey?

Should furs emerge from out the hutch
With labels which the lips shun,
As "coney musquash," or some such Permissible description?

No—let the coney flee from sin,
Nor of his birthright balk a
Poor helpless seal, but sell his skin—
Dearly—to some street hawker.

An insult to the tribe? Tut, tut!
My guileless, frisky rabbit!
I love your silly habits, but
Love more my sealy habit.

NEW FICTION.

You must take a good deal of trouble in reading "The Finer Grain" (Methuen, 6s.), you must bear with Mr. Henry James's involutions even to the extent of returning to the beginning of his sentence to find its connection with the end. But having examined the pitch-blende of his five short stories, you are certainly rewarded by finding pure radium. Of the five, "Mora Montravers" has perhaps most of that finer grain of which Mr. James is a past-master. The story doesn't really matter, though incidentally it proves that divorce-court assumptions of immorality may be too sweeping. The important point is Mr. James's genius for crystallising character. Walter Puddick—Puddick, forsooth—is the unconventional element, who, in spite of sheltering their niece for a period, convinces a conventional Wimbledon pair of the fine gentleman he is. The studies of the Wimbledon pair are inimitable, particularly that of Jane, who offers him a "glittering bribe" to put an end to his chivalry. It is unfortunate that Mr. James is unable to reduce his stories to the limpid clearness of his earlier books, but it is nevertheless some satisfaction still to find work of the tempered quality of "The Finer Grain."

In "Just Between Themselves" (Fisher Unwin, 6s.) Miss Anne Warner lends local colour to her narrative by a profuse sprinkling of German expressions. As far as I can gather, a party of ill-assorted Americans arrange to lead the simple life together in a German Gasthof. The situations might have been funny, the conversation piquant. As it is, situations hardly exist, while the Ellerslies are merely rude. If this is an American conception of humour, "fresh and delightful," it is not difficult to see why American genius sometimes fails to penetrate into this country.

The imaginary kingdom is rather played out, as is also the morganatic marriage, wherein the woman suffers and the king repents. In "The Golden Rose" (Hutchinson, 6s.), however, Mrs. Hugh Fraser and Mr. J. I. Stalhmann have subordinated circumstances to character. The Prince Bishop is finely drawn, as are also Pauline, the Queen, and Lili, the treacherous cousin who betrays Pauline's daughter. Francis Strange, the diplomatic Englishman who eventually marries Pauline, is a more conventional type, but will be doubtless none the less popular for that. Pauline has suffered in her youth from the infidelities of her first husband, and she determines that she will take the happiness of Rose Aurea, her daughter, out of the unreliable hands of Providence and provide it for her herself. But Rose loves Ferdinand, who is only two degrees removed from the throne. The moment you are told that the Crown Prince is sickly it is a foregone conclusion that his infant son is sickly too, and their demise means Rose's undoing. "The Golden Rose," if a little long, is a good and careful piece of workmanship.

Mrs. Vere Campbell has the knack of the evanescent. "For No Man Knoweth" (Greening, 6s.) is so subtle that it is a little difficult to follow. Three painters circle round Hagar, the Breton fisherman's widow, gentle-blooded on one side by the way. Heron teaches her painting and love; St. Jermyn proposes to her; Harvey means to. Something happens to all three of them at the crucial moment, and Hagar very naturally feels exasperated with them, herself, and the world generally. "For No Man Knoweth" is a skilful piece of characterisation, and the men, although of a somewhat over-civilised type, are more real than is usually the case in a woman's novel.

Mr. Snaith knows his "county" to perfection. It is the more regrettable that so little of it, with its hunt, its hounds, and its Amazons, should have found its way into "Mrs Fitz" (Smith, Elder, 6s.). Mrs. Fitz hunts in a scarlet coat, tramples on a hound, and strikes the M.F.H. over the head with a hunting crop. As a daughter of a Vienna circus proprietor, she scandalises the neighbourhood; as Crown Princess of the usual imaginary kingdom these proceedings merely redound to her credit. The King of Illyria is perhaps the best character in the book, having just that amount of barbarism and charm which has ever seated Royalty most firmly on its throne. The abduction of Mrs. Fitz, her rescue, and the visit of her father to an English county home provide a series of piquant contrasts which should render the book more effective than is actually the case.

UPSTAIRS AND DOWNSTAIRS.

South Germany is a happy country. There the police have the servant question in hand, and can be applied to by every mistress or servant for breach of contract. Here a servant is helpless until she has had her month's wages, and a mistress is helpless as soon as she has paid them. A lady writes to a daily paper to ask if there is any legal means of preventing a servant leaving without warning, any legal means of compelling her to keep her engagement instead of writing at the last moment to say she has decided to stay where she is, or any legal arrangement by which a mistress may be recouped for breakages. As things are at present a servant will leave at once if money for breakages is kept back from her wages. South German police must have an uncomfortable time of it occasionally, but after all, the reason for a police at all is that uncomfortable situations arise, and it is the duty of the guardians of the peace to deal with these. Mistresses and maids are alike punished by fine or imprisonment for any breach of contract.

There is, apparently, no possibility of such a situation arising as has been known not uncommonly in England, where a servant ordered to turn out at once for drunkenness or other misdemeanour refuses to go, and the stalwart arm of the law, summoned as a last resource, stands gingerly on the door-mat and says, "I dursn't go down to her. It is more than I'm given power to do. Get her on the door step and I move her on." Get her on the door step! How is anyone going to get to any such position a weighty and wailing lady who is sitting on the middle of the kitchen floor singing "You'll be 'appy some day"?

A great deal of sentimental nonsense is talked about the servant question, and the fact is that what is wanted is an amendment of our laws on the subject.

The Israelites did not exhaust all the plagues. Dust was the eighth which Pharaoh escaped by letting them go. It is the insidious enemy of the housewife at every point. Air is her friend—and it comes laden with these tiny particles, which rest on everything, and, in towns at least, only go for a little excursion when removed with cloth or brush, and drop again in a minute or two. I wish someone would invent a tiny vacuum machine which could be carried about instead of a duster, and would really remove instead of unsettling the dirt. Servants dislike dusting; they have my heartiest sympathy. I would even rather, I think, wash up. But it is odd that people do not realise that dust falls everywhere—even on straight hanging curtains, certainly on upholstered chairs. There is always a great to-do about dusting wooden furniture and ornaments, shaking embroideries, sweeping carpets and floors and beating rugs, and yet, in the very same households, one is greeted on sitting down by the faint smell of dust, which means that the chairs, if brushed once a week, are considered properly attended to. Like rain, dust falls upon the just and the unjust, but there is unfortunately no domestic contrivance to fall upon the dust and the undust and keep them both uniformly clean.

I hear that among people who have a reputation for superiority to keep up the common or garden syphon is now considered beautiful. Personally, I consider the length of its nose and the shortness of its neck are hopeless bars to beauty. Only thirst can endow me with appreciation of its loveliness. Decently veiled in hammered silver, or Liberty pewter, or frosted glass, it becomes fairly ornamental, and I saw a pleasing holder the other day—home-made, too—consisting of a cardboard cylinder covered with a piece of fine old furniture tapestry. But without some covering I cannot find any intrinsic beauty about a syphon as an object of art, apart from its mission to contain the favourite Idris, clear and cool and all ready to sparkle as soon as released. Superiority must be a great fatigue to the superior. It is so beautifully easy to be inferior.

In a recent novel the villain took the heroine for a drive in a motor-car of incredible horse-power and astounding luxury, whose note, nevertheless, "was one of fine simplicity." This latter quality blossomed out into a gold tea service in which everything which could not be made of the precious metal was composed of old egg-shell china, the entire equipage folding away into nothing when the meal was over. If the ordinary person has not yet discovered a way of folding egg-shell china, there are, nevertheless, many ways by which those blessed with this world's goods can manage to be as luxurious when touring as at home.

A pretty young married woman has recently thought out for herself a useful companion for a motor tour. Made of leather, it slips under the seat, and there is nothing about its outside to convey the extreme value of its contents. When the flat lid is opened the interior is seen to be divided into many compartments, and these are fitted with places marked out by bands of silk elastic for every kind of bottle and utensil connected with the toilet. Pedicure ointments and instruments find a place, but so also does an outfit for cleaning every conceivable kind of shoe, from a satin slipper to a fishing boot. The manicure set lives next door, while scent and cosmetic bottles and jars are all accommodated in elastic homes, the elastic allowing for bottles of various sizes and shapes, so that Miladi, having started with Sheba cream in a long flat bottle, may change her mind en route and finish with Troy ointment in a short thick bottle, the elastic receptacle holding either in security.

Doctors say that plain food once a day is the only way to counteract the richness of our modern living, consequently quite a number of people are discovering what savoury little dishes can be made of wholesome ingredients such as the recipes below. As for Bouchées à la Reine, they are always a favourite, but not everybody knows the best way to make them.

Bouchées à la Reine.—Make 8 ozs. of raw white chicken into delicate quenelle, and with it fill eight or nine buttered bouchée moulds; press a hole in the centre of each with the handle of a teaspoon dipped in hot water, in which insert a piece of pâté de foie gras. Cover with the quenelle and steam the moulds, with a greased paper over, until firm, then turn out to cool. After which coat them with white chaud froid sauce, decorate them with crescent-shaped pieces of truffle, and pour over each a little cold liquid aspic. Dish the bouchées each on a slice of ripe, red tomato, with a seasonable mayonnaise salad and a border of aspic.

I think, too, that this entrée may fairly come in the same category:—

Sauté de Pigeons à la Bourgeoise.—Three quite young pigeons should be cut into halves and battened slightly to flatten them. Pour sufficient salad oil into a sautépan to cover the bottom, add a small, finely chopped onion, sauté the birds in the pan until browned on both sides, add an ounce of chopped lean ham, pepper and salt to taste, sprinkle them with flour, pour in a wineglass of claret and sufficient stock to cover the birds. Stir all carefully until boiling, and simmer it on the side of the stove from twenty minutes to half an hour. When dishing the birds garnish them with groups of cooked mushrooms and carrots cut in dice.

Here, too, is a sweet of which the keynote is simplicity:—

Pouding à la Matlock.—Mix a heaped tablespoonful of flour in a basin with sufficient milk from half a pint to make it smooth, heat the remainder of the milk, and pour it boiling on the mixed flour. To this add 3 ozs. of butter, 2 ozs. of powdered sugar, the grated peel of a lemon, and 3 beaten eggs. Pour it into a well-buttered basin, on which put a piece of buttered, grease-proof paper, before tying it down with a cloth. Steam the pudding for an hour, turn it out very carefully, and pour over it a sauce made thus:—Boil a gill of milk with a little grated lemon peel and 6 lumps of sugar, pour it on the beaten yolks of 2 eggs, and stir till it nearly boils.

By SIR FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., &c., Author of "The Cradle of the Deep," &c.

COUNTRY LIFE: "One feels in reading the book precisely as if one were traversing the region with a companion who was extremely well informed, agreeable, and natural. . . . . The book is at once amusing and instructive to a very high degree."

STANDARD: "Sir Frederick Treves is becoming a pathfinder to the roving Englishman of leisure and intelligence. . . . . another agreeable record of unconventional travel. . . . . The book is written with imagination and humour, as well as with pithy directness and picturesque charm. Its attractiveness is enhanced by many fine pictures and an admirable map."

Stocks and Shares.

By HARTLEY WITHERS. Author of "The Meaning of Money." (7th Impression.)

FINANCIAL NEWS: "Very seldom is it the good fortune of the financial book reviewer to light upon such a delightful work as 'Stocks and Shares.' Mr. Hartley Withers 'knows' his subject with intimacy, he writes with a fascinating freshness which disguises dry technicalities and makes reading a sheer enjoyment. The book is a classic, ranking beside the author's 'Meaning of Money,' but appealing to a larger audience."

By R. F. JOHNSTON, M.A. (Oxon), F.R.G.S., District Officer and Magistrate, Weihaiwei, Author of "From Peking to Mandalay." With Map and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

In this book will be found the only full description that exists of the British dependency of Weihaiwei – the three hundred square miles of Chinese territory that have been under British control since 1898. The author, the District Officer and Magistrate of Weihaiwei, has seen service in both South and North China, and has travelled throughout the length and breadth of the Chinese Empire. His book, although primarily dealing with the "Cinderella of the British Empire," practically touches the whole relations of Europeans to Chinamen in their own land.

READY TO-MORROW

The Rogue's Heiress

By TOM GALLON

READY NOV. 1

The Green Patch

By BARONESS VON HUTTEN

The Emigrant Trail

By G. BONNER

"Warm and living there comes out to us from 'THE EMIGRANT TRAIL' the pulsating life of the West. With power and insight and a virile keenness of perception the author has sketched for us the march of a little party of emigrants. She gives us the West in deep draughts. She reaches the bed-rock of human passion. She has the sense of nature, the sense of drama, and the daring spirit of the adventurer. It is a fine equipment" OUTLOOK

Beyond These Voices

By M. E. BRADDON

"The story is one of her best, full as only Miss Braddon or Ouida could have made it. Miss Braddon is a wonder; one hesitates as to which is better, the fulness of the plot or her admirable way of telling it. This book reads like the work of the youngest of our novelists who has somehow managed to be also one of the most complete masters of the art" DAILY TELEGRAPH

"The Novel of the season" JOHN BULL

The Bride's Mirror

By MARGARET BAILLIE-SAUNDERS

"Mrs. Baillie-Saunders writes too rarely. Like Rubens, she paints with real flesh and blood. And she is an Impressionist as well as a Colourist. Her book reminded me many times of Mrs. Humphry Ward, who is also an artist, but does not rivet the attention or chain the imagination so resolutely" JOHN BULL

"A remarkable novel, a really notable book" BRITISH WEEKLY

The Golden Rose

By MRS. HUGH FRASER

"Most ably and forcibly written. The book is well constructed, and much excellent work is contained between its two covers. Much may be forgiven to authors who succeed in keeping their readers' attention riveted on a novel through nearly four hundred and fifty closely-written pages" SPECTATOR

Although its delightful absurdities are reminiscent of Lewis Carroll, and its endowment of phantasy with actuality is suggestive of Swift, Two Waifs in Cloudland has a humour and a picturesqueness of its own. It is safe to say that every child who makes friends with the airy beings of this story will gaze in future at the pageant of the skies with an increased wonder and interest.
